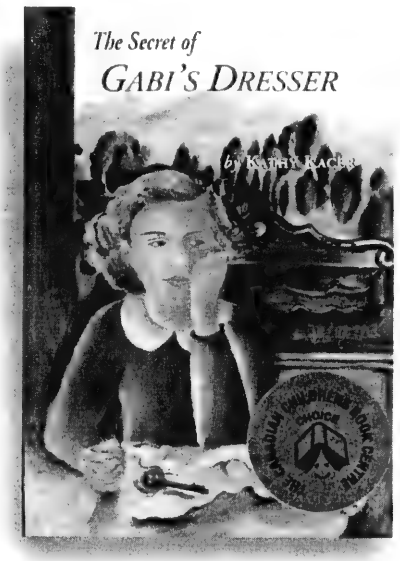
Dressers aren't for hiding in

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



When we think about the furniture in our house, we think of something to sit on, or to put things in, or to sleep in. We don't think about it as a place to hide.

When Vera and Paul played in their grandmother's house, they didn't pay much attention to her dresser. (You would probably call it a buffet, or a cabinet.) It held doilies, candy bowls, photographs, china and silverware.

But Babichka, as they called their grandmother, told them about a time when the dresser held her instead.

Her story is told in The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, by Kathy Kacer (Second Story Press, 1999), and it is based on a true story.

Gabi lived a very comfortable life on a large farm near a village in Czechoslovakia. She giggled and made wonderful plans with her friends on their long walk to school. She played with dolls, helped her mother in the house and loved to talk.

When the Nazis began to control nearby countries, things began to get difficult for Gabi and the other Jewish residents of the town. First, their non-Jewish friends stopped playing with them. Then shopkeepers refused to sell anything to them. When the Jewish children were forbidden to go to school, everyone realized that the trouble would only get worse.

Many of the Jews began to leave, but Gabi and her mother thought they would be safe.

When the Nazis began to take young girls away, the family began to look for places for Gabi to hide. The only thing they could think of was to take everything out of the dresser, including the middle shelf, and make a secret place there.

You will feel Gabi's fear when she is stuck in the dark, airless dresser, while the Nazis tear the apartment apart and her kitten tries to get inside the dresser to be with her.

At this year's Jewish Book Fair, Kathy Kacer, the author, will bring the dresser for people to look at.

You see, Gabi is Kathy's grandmother, and after the war, she got the dresser back and brought it to America when she moved there.

The dresser is still used for photographs and china and silverware. But not for hiding.

Paul Peregal's paintings seem to rise from the canvas

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If you are looking for pretty paintings, forget about Paul Peregal. You may love or hate his works – pulsing, demanding, often brilliant – but you will not be indifferent.

His one-man show continues at the Robert Mede Gallery, 321 Davenport Rd. until Nov. 13, and several paintings will be held over following that date.

Peregal, born in Portland, Maine, studied at The School of Art and Design, Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, under the directorship of Arthur Lismer of the Group of Seven. Lismer instructed him in color theory.

Currently based in Toronto, Peregal has also travelled and lived outside Canada in England, Israel, the United States, Denmark and France.

He focuses on probing portraits and extraordinary landscapes that seem to rise from the canvas in constant motion.

The colors are strong.

Cassette music and readings in sync with his subjects are his companions when he paints. "I can't do it without them" he says. Chamber music and jazz inspire contrasting images.

The Rehearsal, a portrait of cellist Janos Starker, expresses the absorption of the classical musician. Another portrait, Bird, featuring jazz great Charlie Parker – who is known as Bird – playing alto sax in a combo, reveals equal intensity. For both men, the music of the moment is all that matters, and we can feel it in the way their hands grasp the instruments.

Hands are very important to Peregal. "They complete the person," he says.

He is interested in most things around him. Day Game zeroes in on baseball. All tension, it places a batter and catcher in front of the opposing team's tight-lipped manager and overwrought coach. Crowded wooden stands, the kind that are fast disappearing, can be seen in the background.

Paul Peregal's Day Game zeroes in on baseball.

As a boy, Peregal read Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes and other mysteries. His Sleuth at Rest and Sleuth both depict the same suave detective figure, the former almost deceptively languid seated on a couch, the latter ready for action in an alley against a backdrop of early London buildings. The artist has a special affinity for the architecture of the period and for the city itself.

Some years ago in Stratford, Ont., Peregal experienced an "unforgettable" performance by Brian Bedford in the title role of King Lear. In what is perhaps his most moving portrait, he interprets the agonized ruler's despair as sits in his royal robes, mouth agape, hands clenched.

Nor has he neglected the decidedly unroyal. To the accompaniment of author/songwriter Leonard Cohen's Sister of Mercy, which refers to prostitutes, he has conceived a saucy, raunchy, ready and willing visual Sister of Mercy.

Lanhydrock House, in an isolated Cornwall, England, setting, is imbued with foreboding as storm-driven trees toss above the weathered mansion.

Peregal says he starts a painting with a quick impression; then the work takes its own direction. "But it must be meaningful to me," he insists. He concedes, however, that he doesn't know what will happen as it assumes a distinct life that begins to control him. This could explain why his work is never still.

The approach of a new century challenges Peregal. At the Bourlet Gallery near Marble Arch in London, England, he will participate in a group show that opens Nov. 23. He is also geared for an exhibition at the Lamont Gallery early in the new year when it moves to Baker Street, and there is a projected one-man show at Gallery 108 in the City of London's Business District in the spring.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

CAPERNAUM'S ANCIENT SYNAGOGUE & FRIEZES

In the ancient fishing village of Capernaum, above the northwestern shore of the Sea of Galilee, archeologists discovered the remains of a very old structure in 1866. The building, which was excavated and reconstructed between 1905 and 1922, proved to be a second- or third-century synagogue, one of the best preserved examples from that early period of synagogue construction.

The Jewish people have never been known as creative builders and, true to form, this edifice reflects a Greek architectural style. A rectangular building of dressed blocks of white limestone, it faced south towards Jerusalem and featured rows of columns, a stone bench around the perimeter, a women's gallery on an upper level, and a colonnaded hall.

The Torah scrolls were kept in a separate alcove that was apparently a predecessor of the Aron HaKadosh, or Holy Ark.

It is believed the building was razed in an earthquake in the sixth century.

Although the reconstructed building is roofless, the walls and many pillars have been restored to their original positions. Portions of a richly decorated frieze and several cornices were also recovered in the ruins.

Parts of the frieze are on view along a walkway outside the synagogue. The decorative motifs include a menorah, a five-pointed star known as Solomon's Seal, and the earliest known example of the six-pointed Star of David. Decorations also include pomegranates, bunches of grapes, olive branches and a variety of real and mythic animals.

Here one may also see the oldest graphic representation of the Holy Ark of the Covenant, the wagon in which the ancient Israelites kept the Ten Commandments and the Torah, in order to transport them into and out of battle. An olive press, basalt flour mill and other non-religious implements from 2,000 years ago are also on display.

Beneath the foundation of this limestone building, archeologists have uncovered the dark basalt remains of an older structure, believed to be an earlier synagogue that was destroyed by the Romans. There is a Christian tradition attached to the site – namely, that this was the synagogue where Jesus preached, healed and exorcised demons, and from which he was eventually expelled by the Jewish congregants.

The town's name derives from the Hebrew name K'far Nachum, or Village of Nachum, but very little is remembered of its namesake, Nachum. Many more legends regarding Jesus have become part of the lore of the village, which was his home when he began his ministry. Like many sites in the Galilee region, Capernaum will certainly be flooded with pilgrims in the coming millennium year.

Near the old synagogue, the ruins of a church mark what is believed to be the former house of the Christian apostle, Peter. A mosaic floor was found in a room in which Jesus was supposed to have slept.

The site was purchased by the Franciscans who built an octagonal church on stilts above the remains. Boasting a modern design, the church architecture has not been universally praised. One guidebook refers to it as "an ugly chapel that resembles a flying saucer hovering above the ruins."

Also nearby is Tabgha, which Christians associate with the multiplication of the loaves and fishes, and the sermon on the Mount. A Byzantine ruin was uncovered here in 1932 and reconstructed in the early 1980s. The Church of the Mount of Beatitudes is also an important site for Christian pilgrims.

Many villages in the region likewise possess strong Christian traditions. The lakeside village of Migdal, for example, whose name means "tower" in Hebrew, apparently gave rise to the surname Magdalene. A small domed shrine is supposed to mark the birthplace of Mary Magdalene, the figure from Christian scripture.

Ornamental stars at the Capernaum Synagouge. [B.Gladstone]

In Kana, the story is still told of how Jesus performed his first miracle at a dinner party.

In Kursi, archeologists have uncovered the ruins of a Byzantine church. A powerful spotlight illuminates a cave in a nearby mountainside, where according to legend Jesus healed a man possessed by demons.

As we know, Israel is the cradle of three great world religions whose stories are inextricably woven into the landscape. Whenever we approach sites that others hold as holy, we must do so with respect and a willingness to learn more about religious beliefs and traditions that are not our own.

Summer best time to visit Israel in 2000

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After several years of grandiose projections, Israeli tourism officials have come down to earth about how many visitors the country is expecting in the year 2000.

Predictions issued by the Israel Ministry of Tourism several years ago ranged between four and five million. But last week, Jonathan Harpaz, director general of the Jerusalem Hotel Association, gave a much more realistic estimate.

"We are forecasting three million," he told a group of travel agents and travel writers during a luncheon hosted by the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto. "We might exceed it, but only by a little."

In 1997, the Jewish state received about 2.5 million visitors. Since then, according to Harpaz, there has been "an awakening of tourism," especially since Ehud Barak became prime minister.

Tourism traffic into Israel has increased by roughly eight percent each month since October 1998, Harpaz said. Overall, hotel occupancy rates in Jerusalem for 2000 are expected to average about 85 percent.

"I would suggest that you do your booking (of hotel rooms) as early as possible, because – if I may quote – you might not find a room at the inn," he said. "Some dates may be fully booked."

Available hotel rooms in Jerusalem are already scarce for next Passover, as March and April are already fully booked, Harpaz said. Thanks to some big conventions coming to Jerusalem, May is also fully booked, as are October and November.

The best months for availability of hotel rooms in Jerusalem next year is the summer, he said. "If the heat doesn't bother you, that's the best time to go."

Rooms are also available in January and February, he said, but he added a caveat: "I can't guarantee anything because reservations are flowing in even while I'm speaking."

The Ministry of Tourism has received isolated complaints from tour operators in Japan, England and New York that hotels in Jerusalem were unduly raising prices and demanding minimum stays during the year of the Christian Millennium, he reported.

"Prices have not been raised drastically," he said. "The official rates were raised for 2000 by an average of seven percent – sometimes five percent, sometimes 10 percent. They were raised because in the last three years the rates were kept low because of the political situation."

He also asserted that hotels were not demanding minimum stays –"not in Jerusalem and not anywhere in Israel" – except, perhaps, in cases involving optional contractual agreements.

'Good Samaritan' saved 600 Jews

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It's doubtful whether many Canadians have ever heard of the late Charlie Grant. In an era of heightened anti-Semitism, he was a bright candle illuminating the darkness.

Grant, a Presbyterian from Vancouver, was a diamond broker in Vienna when Nazi Germany annexed Austria in 1938. When the lives of his Jewish friends were threatened, he illegally obtained passports and exit visas for them. Grant, a good Samaritan, thereby saved about 600 Jews.

He was, to put it succinctly, the Canadian Raoul Wallenberg.

On Thursday, Nov. 11 at 9 p.m., and again on Sunday, Nov. 14 at the same time, TVOntario presents his inspirational story. Charlie Grant's War, felicitously directed by Martin Lavut from a fine script by Anna Sandor, stars R.H. Thompson as Grant.

In a stellar performance, Thompson portrays Grant as a happy-go-lucky, moralistic person who risked his life, and almost lost it, by coming to the aid of Jews.

The two-hour film, which was originally screened on CBC TV in the early 1980s, is also an indictment of Canada as a narrow, ethnocentric society in the 1930s.

Charlie's uncle, urging him to leave Vienna and come back home, makes an anti-Semitic crack about an Austrian Jewish businessman who helped his nephew.

Charlie's mother, using her influence to try to expedite the immigration of Austrian Jews to Canada, discovers that Canadian government officials, including the prime minister, are smugly prejudiced.

Yet she herself is hardly a paragon of tolerance. "It's one thing to keep Jews out of clubs," she says in dulcet tones. "I understand that." But to stand by and let the Nazis kill Jews is quite another matter. There she draws the line.

Charlie Grant's War opens in 1930 as Grant, presumably fresh out of university, embarks on a grand tour of Europe.

On his first night in Vienna, he is fleeced by a smooth con artist and rendered destitute. Fortunately, he meets the Goldmans (Jan Rubes and Joan Orenstein), a kindly, prosperous Jewish couple who take him under their wing. Through the Goldmans, he meets Paul Glazer, a Jewish diamond broker (Peter Boretski) who gives him a job and a career. Soon enough, Grant is dating a comely blonde actress (Belinda Metz).

Austria's transition from independent state to Nazi appendage under Hitler's control unfolds through the medium of newsreels and through a proliferation of anti-Jewish slogans and swastikas which suddenly appear all over Vienna.

In these sombre times, Grant's goodness and integrity emerge. He refuses to fire a Jewish employee. He breaks off relations with his ambitious girlfriend when she replaces a leading Jewish actress who has been frozen out of the theatre by anti-Semitic laws. And when Goldman is roughed up by storm troopers and forced to scrub the pavement, Grant tries in vain to intervene.

The core of Charlie Grant's War turns on Grant's selfless efforts to help Jews emigrate. The first Jew for whom he obtains a passport is his employee's sister. Grant relies on bribery to grease his clandestine operation.

In telling scenes which speak volumes about Canadian attitudes to Jews, Charlie's mother tries unsuccessfully to wring entry visas from the infamous F.C. Blair, the director of immigration, and Mackenzie King, the premier.

"Jews are not like you and me," coos Blair, offering the self-serving rationale that Jewish immigrants will inflame existing anti-Semitism. King, urging her not to exaggerate Nazi anti-Jewish measures, claims that Canadians will not react positively to "a flood of Jews." Indeed, Canada admitted only about 5,000 Jewish refugees during this period.

Grant pays dearly for his kind disposition, being beaten and jailed by the Gestapo and, subsequently, shipped off to a concentration camp, where he toils in a quarry. The last of these scenes are relatively weak and pallid.

Despite this lapse, Charlie Grant's War is an appealing film with a strong moral message and acceptable production values. Watch for it.

Tribal Productions goes Drinking Alone

BY KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Four years ago, Samuel Owen and Eli Lukawitz met as students at York University and decided to do some theatre projects outside of school.

With a third partner, Owen's wife, actor Lisa Horner, they formed the company Tribal Productions.

This year, Tribal Productions has been invited by Glen Garwald, general manager of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, to be the resident company at the centre's Studio Theatre.

The first of its three offerings this season is the Toronto premiere of Norm Foster's Drinking Alone, directed by Lukawitz, which runs Nov. 5 to 21. Foster will be in Toronto for the premiere.

For this production, Owen wears three hats – he is co-artistic director, producer and actor in the role of Joe Todd.

The Toronto native graduated from Ryerson's Theatre Program in Toronto. "As soon as I became a union actor, I realized how hard it was to get work and that I would be doing a lot of waitering and a lot of waiting around."

Not satisfied with a Ryerson diploma, he went to York University to get a degree.

"I didn't know a lot about directing, but I thought it was something I would like to explore," he said.

When the company first started, the three partners financed their own shows at small theatres.

"In the past, we would do a show then find another space to do the next show. Trying to build an audience when you're moving locations is very hard.

"Now we are able to do our first subscription season because we are in one theatre all year long. That allows us to grow. It's like any other business."

Tribal Productions is wholly sponsored by Corporate and private donations. This fall, the company launched a campaign to sell 750 season subscriptions. Owen hopes to take a small salary for the first time, to augment his job at a brokerage firm.

"What I learned from running a theatre company is you have to make it hip, popular and interesting to see, because it is very difficult to break into the theatre market here. Our company is [aiming] to become 'Canadian Stage North' by producing accessible shows, comedies and dramas, as well as Canadian premieres."

As an actor, Owen has lent his talents to a number of theatrical productions inside and outside his own company. They include The Foursome at Theatre New Brunswick and Theatre-on-the-Grand; Affections of May, 18 Wheels, I'll Be Back Before Midnight and On Golden Pond, all at the Upper Canada Playhouse; and Tribal Productions' The Puppetmaster of Lodz, Jake's Women, The Diary of Anne Frank and Will.

Drinking Alone, a comedy with touching moments, is about the pain of a dysfunctional family.

Owen describes his character Joe Todd as a 33-year-old dry cleaner who gets a call from his father announcing he is coming to town. To impress his father, Joe hires an escort to play his fiancée for the evening to show how successful he has become in his personal life. Mayhem ensues when the escort shows up and it turns out to be her first night on the job.

Tickets for the three productions are $69 to $79, students and seniors, $55. Call Ford Centre Subscription Office at 733-0545. For individual tickets at $20 to $30, call Ticketmaster at 870-8000.

Village manager helps us see the past with new eyes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Marty Brent, manager of Black Creek Pioneer Village is doing a 20th-century job in the 19th century.

The village, located on over 75 acres at Steeles Avenue and Jane Street in the Black Creek Conservation Area, is a heritage project of the Toronto and Region Conservation Authority (TRCA), and is a re-creation of a village typical of south-central Ontario between the years 1793 and 1867.

The village evolved from an original 14 acres of land acquired in 1954 by the Humber Valley Conservation Authority, which eventually joined forces with Don Valley, Etobicoke-Mimico, and Rouge, Duffin, Highland, Petticoat streams conservation authorities to become TRCA.

On the land was a Pennsylvania German log barn built in 1809. The restoration and opening of this building, now the Dalziel Museum, marked the beginning of a program which has developed to preserve cultural heritage.

In 1960, Pioneer Village, with seven buildings in addition to the Dalziel Museum, opened to visitors.

Funding of the village comes from the Ministry of Citizenship, Culture and Recreation, admissions and sales, and through donations to the Conservation Foundation of Greater Toronto.

Brent, who has been with Pioneer Village since 1990, is originally from California. She has a history degree from Stanford University and a master's degree in museum studies from the University of Toronto.

"Having had the opportunity of living in the United States and Canada, I think I've developed a balanced perception of life. Canadians have a tremendous understanding and respect of other cultures. On the most part, they realize that there is not one way of thinking," Brent said.

Learning about the past, she says, is how people come to understand the future. "When people, especially young people, come here, it gives them an impression of how life has improved, and it helps them understand why certain values persist – values such as respecting others and living compatibly, and leaving the world a better place. "It also anchors us into values such as taking care of the environment. If we look back, we can see that recycling was an inborn concept. Quilts, for example, came from fabrics of outgrown clothes, and rags that could not be used for other garments."

Paper, which was scarce until the middle of the 19th century was never thrown away, she says. "People read a paper, wrapped a parcel with it, and eventually rolled it into a spill which was used to light a fire."

The past, she says, helps people see things with new eyes. "Life today has become simplified through technology. Looking back helps us understand how far we've come. Without the past, we are rudderless."

Marty Brent with two of the costumed interpreters who work at the village.

There are a lot of lessons to be learned at the village, Brent says. "Kids learn that everything had a purpose. There was no excess, no luxury of throwing things out.

"They also learn by connection. They see how children from the 19th century dressed, and they think about what they would look like. It helps them to appreciate today's life."

On the other hand, she says, "we've learned not to do such things as pasture animals near a water system. People today need to learn what caused harm, and the impact the harm had."

For her, Brent says, the past provides a social history. "I like to know how certain customs and traditions started, how communities came together and evolved, and how inventions such as farming implements, sewing machines and printing presses changed their lives."

Included among the approximately 75 people who work at the village are costumed interpreters who work in 40 heritage buildings that include: a tinsmith shop, where sheets of metal are transformed into lanterns, pitchers and cookie cutters; a harness shop and saddlery where handcrafted leather items are made; a weaver's shop with looms; and a blacksmith shop where hot metal is used to forge household items and repair wagons.

Apple trees, which continue to bear fruit, were planted by the original settlers, and all of the plants in the village gardens are heritage plants; some varieties of flowers and vegetables date back to the 15th century.

Also at the village is an educational staff, mostly former teachers, who lead the more than 13 school programs for students at all grade levels. One program, which Brent says has a two to three-year waiting-list, has students coming to the village daily for one week, to learn in the school house –in traditional dress – work in the garden, bake bread, and generally help out around the village.

"This is hands-on history. They become immersed in village life," she says.

"Living history museums such as this village, Upper Canada Village, and Century Village in Peterborough, allow people to see history three-dimensionally. The buildings, the gardens, the people and the animals are combined in order to make history educational and entertaining."

It is a tremendous challenge, she says, to find creative ways of meeting today's building codes when dealing with a historical site. "We've had to discover 20th-century ways to deal with the 19th century. For example, there are no overhead wires – some hydro wires are hidden in a wood shed – and the maintenance crew does not drive on village grounds. Everything takes a lot more time, but we are trying not to intrude on visitor's enjoyment of the 19th century."

Pioneer Village, says Brent, is a fascinating and diverse business, with a number of ventures rolled into one. The museum houses a collection of artifacts, and the educational facility provides programs for formal and informal groups. "As well, there is a retail end which includes a gift shop, there are catering and banquet facilities, and it has been the location for commercial filming."

As manager of the $4-million a year operation, Brent oversees the various aspects of the facility. "I've been fascinated with museums since I was a child, and I was thrilled when I realized there was an entire profession connected to the museum world."

After graduating from the University of Toronto, she was a museum adviser with the Ontario Ministry of Culture, and then went to York University to specialize in non-profit sector management. "This is a perfect place for me because, as a facility that blends heritage and business, it demands an expert in both fields."

TRCA, its umbrella organization, provides support services such as accounting, insurance issues and human resources.

Looking to the millennium, Brent says that Pioneer Village is at an exciting stage in its development. "We're looking to expand again – building new facilities in order to provide more varied programming. We haven't grown in the past couple of years. Today's audiences want interactive programming, and we want to broaden what we have to offer.

"We'd also like to improve our food services and offer more products for sale. We're poised and ready to move into the next stage of development."

Ottawa girl shares medical condition on the Web

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A 12-year-old girl who lives with constant pain has created a Web site support group which has attracted children from around the world.

Aya Ravek was diagnosed a year and a half ago with Reflex Sympathetic Dystrophy (RSD), a condition of the sympathetic nervous system. The condition, considered very rare in children, occurs suddenly, is difficult to diagnose and can result in constant pain from even the slightest touch.

Aya's mother, Pamela, says "the nerves are out of whack. The nervous system doesn't reset and the brain is still getting the message of pain, acting as though the injury is still there."

The Ravek family's odyssey began in March, 1998 when Aya was hit in the knee during a floor hockey game in gym class. The injury didn't heal and it took months until the proper diagnosis was made.

The length of time between onset and diagnosis is crucial in terms of successful treatment, Pamela said, and Aya suffered both physically and emotionally as they searched for help.

Aya and her parents have been travelling to Toronto where Aya is being treated at the Hospital for Sick Children by a team of physicians.

Her Toronto psychiatrist, Dr. Arlette Lefebvre, suggested that Aya put together a scrapbook to help her explain to schoolmates what she is going through.

She and her parents then did extensive research on the condition.

The scrapbook explains that even the spray of water from a shower can cause her excruciating pain. It has helped Aya answer other children's questions such as, "Is it contagious?" and "Are you going to die from this?" The answer to both is no.

The idea of the Web site, called Aya's No Pain Zone (www.ordesign.com/NoPainZone/) evolved from the success of the scrapbook.

"We thought of the Web site as being a scrapbook on-line," says Aya's father, Oded, "but, to our amazement, it turned out to be a tool. We get so many responses from kids with RSD and other chronic illnesses who have derived comfort from communicating with Aya.

Aya Ravek

"The site is really being used now as a healing tool. Aya gets so many e-mails from children and she has become a source of comfort. This site explains the disease from a kid's point of view rather than a medical text."

Aya has also developed a form which she distributed to her Grade 7 class describing what it is like for her to have RSD so that the children will understand that she cannot be touched or bumped.

She will be adding this form to her Web site to be used by other children as a starting point for their own personalized forms.

Although she has been studying the proper keyboarding technique in order to work on her Web site, it is sometimes too painful for her to use her fingers. She then dictates to her parents who help her with the input.

She answers all her e-mails and has heard from children as far away as Australia, although she has only found two other girls in the Ottawa area with RSD.

Lefebvre, who the Raveks laughingly call "Aya's agent" because of her tremendous support and encouragement, has nominated Aya for a Young Achievement Award. She has also been nominated for the Ontario Junior Citizen of the Year Award through the community newspaper association.

Although she struggles daily with pain, takes 20 pills a day, does extensive exercises and spends a great deal of time working with medical professionals, Aya has also managed to develop and maintain the Web site.

"We started out with the idea that this would help Aya," says Pamela. "It is quite wonderful that it has ended up helping others."

Treating depression

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Half the general population referred to a family doctor for depression are not getting any treatment and this is "unacceptable," a Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care researcher said.

Referring to depression as the most common behavioral illness, Dr. Helen Mayberg said 25 percent of these patients decide against treatment due to a "social stigma," and 25 percent decide to live with the illness.

"No one should be in those two categories," said Mayberg, who holds the Sandra Rotman Chair in Neuropsychiatry at the University of Toronto and Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute.

Even patients who deny they are ill should be taken to a doctor or neurologist on the pretext that some other disease is being investigated, she said.

One in five people will have at least one episode of depression and the disease affects more women than men, "for reasons we don't understand," Mayberg said. The cost to society in medical care and lost time at work due to depression is exceeded only by cardiac cases.

Unfortunately, she said, about 30 percent of depressive episodes are chronic, and after three episodes, there is a 90 percent chance of recurrence.

Anti-depressant drugs are mainly used today, she said, while shock treatment, ECT, (electroconvulsive therapy) "is extremely effective, particularly in the elderly."

Mayberg said that she is a neurologist who is in favor of biological instead of psychological treatment.

"The bad news is that we have no idea what the chemical abnormality is, and the good news is that we have drugs to treat it and 65 percent of patients respond. ECT is effective in 10 to 15 percent [of the cases] and about 20 percent are treatment resistant," she said.

Though there are no biological markers to aid in drug selection, she said improvements in scanning of the brain give hope that it will be possible some day, and that the scans will provide a clue to the role of the frontal lobe in depression.

"We are getting images today that are better than looking at the brain itself," she said.

Mayberg gave the first Ada Starkman lecture titled Depression, It's Not In Your Head, It's In Your Brain, to about 100 people at Baycrest.

Marlene Ratner and Howard Black, grandchildren of Ada Starkman, were in the audience.

The Ada Starkman lectures, which continue every Monday at Baycrest until Oct. 26, are an attempt to reach out to the aging population of the community, said Elaine Todres, Baycrest Foundation president.

Brain artery repaired in Israel

NEW YORK — A Jordanian tourist who was on her honeymoon in Israel, was saved by a new medical procedure after being severely injured in a car accident. Her husband died in the accident.

The 23-year-old was found unconscious and brought to the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem. Two days later, she was transferred to the Rabin Medical Centre to have a tear in the main artery in her brain repaired.

At the Rabin centre she underwent a new non-surgical procedure, performed for the first time in Israel. A balloon was inserted through her groin into the brain blood vessels. It was then inflated and used to seal the hole in the artery of her brain.

Dr. Shimon Maimon, head of the invasive neuroradiology unit at Rabin, performed the procedure with the assistance of the staff of the department of neurosurgery. The procedure took more than three hours and was done under full anesthesia.

When the patient awoke after the procedure was completed, she was out of danger and fully conscious. She is recovering, and doing well.

The Rabin Medical Centre was established in 1996 as a result of the merger of the Beilenson Hospital and the Golda (Hashaon) Hospital in Petach Tikvah, which is 20 minutes from Tel Aviv.

Affiliated with Tel Aviv University's Sackler School of Medicine, the Rabin centre, with 1,300 beds, 37 operating rooms and 41 departments is the largest medical centre in Israel. It employs 4,500 people.

More than 150,000 people are treated in the emergency rooms and some 500,000 are seen in outpatient clinics annually.

Raptors host Jewish Toronto night at ACC

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tuesday, Nov. 30 promises to be a red-letter – make that purple-letter – day for Jewish Raptors fans: it's Jewish Toronto Night at the Air Canada Centre.

The Raptors, who play the Atlanta Hawks at 7 p.m., will donate a portion of ticket sales to UJA Federation's Campaign 2000. Over 500 seats are available for the special event, a collaboration of UJA Federation and the Toronto Raptors. The Canadian Jewish News is a media sponsor.

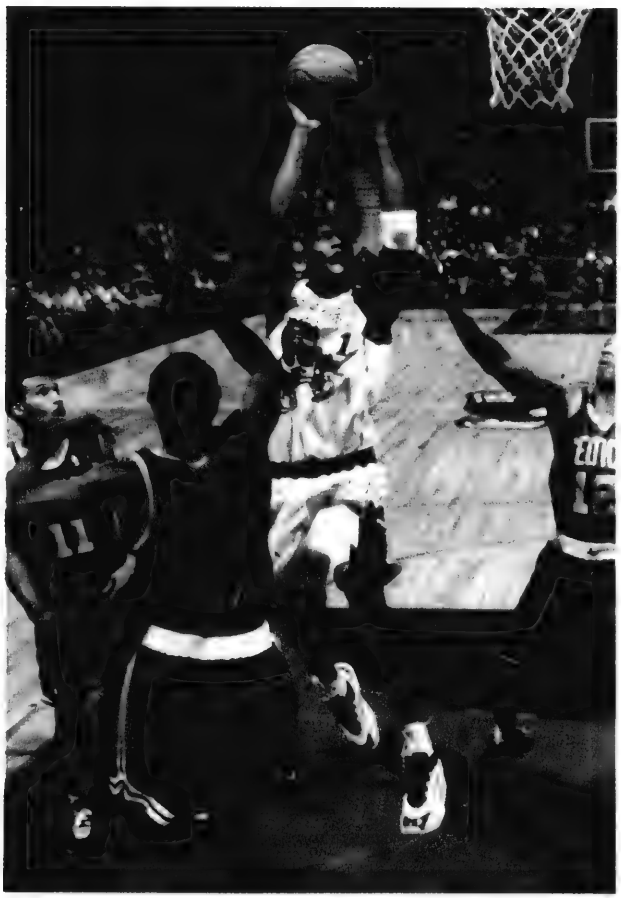
Kosher snacks, including hot dogs and pretzels, will be available.

"I think Toronto has a great team this year, and a great chance to make the playoffs," said Abe Glowinsky, a vice-chair of Campaign 2000.

The event will provide an opportunity to "show how vibrant the Jewish community is in Toronto... and just show some spirit," he said. "We're happy to be partners with the Raptors."

Ticket prices are $50 for lower bowl endzone, $20 for balcony – a saving of $16.50 and $6.50 respectively.

Tickets are available until Nov. 23 at the Negev Book Store (3509 Bathurst St.), the Bathurst Jewish Centre (4558 Bathurst St.) or Israel's The Judaica Centre (441 Clark Ave. W. and 897 Eglinton Ave. W.); or by calling the UJA Federation hotline at 631-5700.



RAPTOR ACTION: Toronto Raptors stars Tracy McGrady, Vince Carter and Doug Christie on the hardwood floor.

Former hockey player coaches Maccabis

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Approximately 11 years ago, former hockey player Ted Badner traded in his sticks and skates for a whistle and clipboard when he began coaching the Maccabi's boys basketball team.

Badner, 34, can be described as a no-nonsense disciplinarian who puts his troops through a gruelling 2½ hours of practice, three times a week.

The squad made an early exit when San Francisco beat them by six points in the Rochester Maccabi quarter-final games this year.

Badner, who also toiled as a basketball player for one year, describes his team in the Rochester games as inexperienced.

"We were young, and had only six kids who returned. Next year we expect to be strong and, obviously, more experienced," he said.

They are already looking forward to next summer's games.

"We think we will be good enough to compete ... We would ultimately like to come home with a medal," the coach said.

When describing the competition at the games, Badner compares the devotion that kids in the United States have for basketball to the passion that kids in Canada have for the game of hockey.

"American kids take to basketball like Canadian kids take to hockey. The kids in America play at a higher level than we do. However...we have learned, and been instilled with the ability to compete and not to quit," he said.

According to the coach, many of the players on the team aspire to eventually get a scholarship and play ball in the United States.

Badner, who was blessed with a baby girl not too long ago, would like to have something to show her next summer in the form of a gold medal by knocking off the top teams from the United States.

So far, the highlight to Badner's career will have to be the silver medal that his squad won at the Hartford Maccabi games.

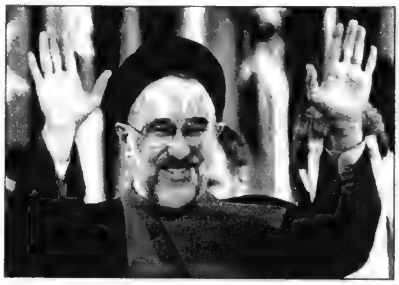
Barak turns up heat on Russia for aiding Iran

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak has decided to step up efforts to convince the United States that it should put more pressure on Russia to stop helping Iran develop missiles and nuclear capabilities.

Israel will notify the Clinton administration this week that it will not help it block legislation in the Senate that would impose sanctions on Russia if it continues to aid Iran.

"We will not take part in a public campaign or mobilize the pro-Israel lobby in Congress against Russia," said a close Barak associate yesterday. "But if we are asked, we will express our views and not stand on the sidelines."



Iran's President Mohammed Khatami

The House of Representatives has passed a bill to impose sanctions on Russia over its aid to Iran; the bill is expected to pass soon in the Senate. Clinton administration officials have opposed such sanctions for fear of further weakening Boris Yeltsin's government.

During a visit to Washington in July, Barak agreed to a request from the U.S. administration that Israel would refrain for three months from pressing Washington to impose sanctions, and then would reassess its position.

A joint Israeli-American committee that oversees the handling of the U.S. response to Russian-Iranian co-operation was scheduled to convene this Wednesday. The committee, headed by Leon Furth, national security adviser to Vice-President Al Gore, is meeting ahead of the U.S. visit of Russian Atomic Energy Minister Yevgeniy Adamov, who is considered by Israel to be the architect of Russian nuclear aid to Iran.

Barak is expected to express his opposition to the aid in talks with his Russian counterpart, Vladimir Potanin, in Oslo this week.

Israeli military intelligence believes that the flow of missile and nuclear technology from Russia to Iran has continued unabated. The Russians have taken some steps to better monitor the export of missile technology, such as publishing new regulations and placing supervisors in factories, but it is unclear if those steps have had much impact. In the nuclear arena, Russian aid has continued to Iran.

The Times of London quoted "intelligence sources in the west and the Middle East" – an apparent reference to Israeli sources – as saying there was a secret agreement to smuggle missile parts and nonconventional weapons from Russia to Iran via the Caspian Sea. The Russians and the Iranians denied the report.

Furth is thought by Israel to oppose sanctions on the grounds the that they are not effective and would only help to destabilize the Yeltsin regime. The Israeli members of the joint committee will provide him with Israel's latest intelligence assessment of the situation and ask him what the United States plans to do next.

Israel now has a "political card" at its disposal. Gore and his aides know that their stance toward Russia will be the central foreign issue to dominate the upcoming U.S. presidential election. The Republicans are expected to bait Gore on the issue and accuse him of being too soft on the Russians. In such a situation, Gore is likely to be more attentive to Israel's views.

ROASTED GARLIC CHARRED TOMATO BISQUE

1 large onion, peeled, quartered	olive oil
8 med. plum tomatoes, cored & seeded	2 tblsp. brown sugar
1 bulb elephant garlic, roasted, mashed	1/3 cup broth, boiled
1 can (28 oz) undrained plum tomatoes, chopped	salt
6 fresh basil leaves, thinly sliced	pepper

Preheat broiler or barbeque. Brush onion lightly with oil and grill until golden and slightly blackened on edges, remove and set aside. Grill tomatoes until skin blisters. Remove from heat, peel off skin.

In med. saucepan, heat 1 tblsp olive oil over med. heat. Add charred onion, tomatoes and roasted garlic cloves removed from bulb. (To roast garlic, trim top, brush with oil and bake in 350°F oven 45-60 mins.) Cook tomato mixture 2-3 mins. Add brown sugar, being careful not to scorch as it caramelizes. Stir and scrape bottom and sides of pan, then add canned tomatoes and broth. Stir occasionally, allowing soup to simmer on med.-low heat. Reduce by half.

Using blender, purée hot soup, season with salt and pepper. Pour into bowls and garnish with basil. Yield: 4 cups.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have a problem involving my brother Harry. He is 52 and a successful businessman. He is also involved in a number of prestigious companies and is well known in the community, as he has a seat on the board of a few important organizations.

Harry has three children ranging in age from 17 to 25. A couple of years ago, Harry and his wife split up after a 27-year marriage.

Harry seems to have gotten the hang of the singles life. He has dated a number of different women; however, he has gone out exclusively with the one he is seeing now, for over three months, and I'm worried. You see she is 29 years old. He looks absolutely ridiculous with her, and I can just imagine how his peers must be talking about him.

I'm sure this woman is more interested in Harry's money than in Harry. I am afraid to approach the subject with him because I know he will tell me to mind my own business. Is there any tactful way I can get around this without losing the relationship I have with my brother?

Yearning for Youth

Dear Yearning for Youth

It sounds as though Harry has a very full life. He has managed to raise a family, do well in business and gain the respect of many members of the community. He sounds very well rounded and definitely in the driver's seat.

I have to wonder why you feel a man who can do so much right with his life is so inept when it comes to picking who to spend his social time with.

On one hand, you make Harry sound like an intelligent pillar in the community, and on the other hand, you make him sound like a love-struck moron.

I think you have to give Harry a bit more credit. If this young woman is out for your brother's money, I think you can assume that Harry probably has figured that out by now. However, just maybe, this woman is bright, intelligent, has a good heart and brings out the youth in your brother. Just maybe, your brother loves to have a pretty young woman to spend time with, to possibly be the envy of his friends, to enjoy life as he has not had a chance to for a long time.

Give your brother the benefit of the doubt. Don't assume the worst. Just maybe, Harry knows what he is doing.

Ontario snubs UN ruling

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario has indicated it won't comply with a landmark ruling by the United Nations that found the province discriminates against Jews and other non-Catholics when it comes to school funding.

In a decision released last Friday, the UN human rights committee said Canada – specifically Ontario – violates a 1976 international human rights covenant by funding Catholic but not other religious-based schools, especially Jewish day schools.

The historic ruling was hailed by the Jewish community as a vindication – before the entire world – of its long-held view that Ontario's practice of funding separate schools, but not Jewish and other faith-based schools, is unfair and discriminatory.

It was also the last in a long line of legal recourses to which the Jewish community has looked for redress. Exactly three years ago, Canada's Supreme Court ruled that public funding of Ontario's Catholic schools, to the exclusion of other religions, was legal.

The funding issue was taken to the UN in February 1996 by Toronto parent Arieh Waldman, who says he has spent nearly $100,000 to educate his two sons at Bialik Hebrew Day School, while paying education taxes all along.

In its 15-page ruling, the UN said that "differences in treatment between Roman Catholic religious schools, which are publicly funded as a distinct part of the public education system, and schools of [Waldman's] religion, which are private by necessity, cannot be considered reasonable and objective."

The UN also gave Canada 90 days either to comply with the ruling, or to propose a remedy.

But it looks as though Ontario will ignore the finding.

Feature on homeless youth

JERUSALEM — After finishing yeshiva in Ontario, Adam came to Israel to study for a year. Like many youths his age, the trip to Israel was the culmination of Torah studies in Canada and the United States.

But Adam's year abroad didn't turn out the way most would expect.

Until 10 months ago, Adam, now 20, was homeless, suicidal, on drugs, and in jail.

Now clean for the first time since he started abusing drugs when he was just 13 years old, Adam is starting life again. His arrest for pushing drugs and a month in an Israeli jail, which Adam refers to as "a living hell," helped change his outlook on life.

But it is Raquel Sanchez, a social worker and director of The Rose Institute, which helps English-speaking homeless and troubled youth in Jerusalem, who got him back on his feet.

"Ever since I met Raquel, my life has changed," says Adam, who first met her when he was behind bars. "I have the motivation to go on because I know Raquel and the Rose Institute are behind me."

The time of day doesn't matter: Zion Square, the intersection of the pedestrian malls of Ben Yehuda Street and Yoel Solomon Street, is always brimming with people.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Russian Aliyah Up

TORONTO — If current trends continue, 65,000 Jews will emigrate from the former Soviet Union (FSU) to Israel this year, nearly half of them from Russia alone, reports UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. A statement from the organization says that some 21,000 Russian Jews have already arrived in Israel, compared to 9,000 at this time a year ago, an increase of over 130 percent. The surge is being attributed to escalating Russian anti-Semitism, military actions in Chechnya and Dagestan and economic instability throughout the FSU.

ISRAEL

Disabled Angry

JERUSALEM — Wheelchair-bound Israelis blocked the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv road near the entrance to the capital last week as part of a dispute with the finance ministry over welfare. The action by disabled Israelis, which began nearly a month ago, has been an embarrassment for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, who made a campaign pledge to help them.

Olmert Joins JA

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert has joined the Jewish Agency for Israel's 121-member board of governors. The agency's board also approved a $376 million budget for the year 2000. Special funds were also approved for programs in impoverished neighbourhoods as well as for rescue operations in the former Soviet Union, Ethiopia and Yugoslavia.

Assassination Fears

JERUSALEM — Israeli security officials refused to let Prime Minister Ehud Barak speak at the Tel Aviv square where Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated. Saying it could not guarantee the prime minister's safety, the Shin Bet balked at his appearing at a rally marking the fourth anniversary of the assassination.

WORLD

Price for J'Accuse

LONDON — A rare copy of a famous denunciation of French anti-Semitism is to be auctioned here this month. Christie's auctioneers estimate Emile Zola's J'Accuse will sell for $6,600. The 1898 letter by the French novelist denounces the imprisonment of Jewish officer Alfred Dreyfus on false charges of spying for Germany.

Rabbi to Name Names

LONDON — An Orthodox rabbi here says he will name and shame estranged husbands who refuse to give their wives a get, or Jewish divorce, that would enable the women to remarry according to Jewish law. Rabbi Pini Dunner of the Saatchi Synagogue in London said the names will be posted on his shul's Web site next month.

Magazine to Apologize

TOKYO — The publisher of a major Japanese magazine agreed to run an apology and a retraction for an anti-Semitic statement in a recent article. The Oct. 15 article in the Shukan Post, Japan's second-largest weekly magazine, claimed that "Wall Street Jews" were behind an American company's Sept. 28 takeover of a Japanese credit bank. The company that publishes the magazine also agreed to hold a seminar on the Holocaust and human rights.

No to Jewish Lawyers

DENVER — Jewish lawyers should not represent a Christian family, according to an attorney for a boy injured in the Columbine High School shootings earlier this year. Denver lawyer Anthony Sturniolo sent a letter to the family after they decided to hire Michigan lawyer Geoffrey Fieger and local co-counsel Howard Zucker. "I know that you are committed Christians, and I do not want you to be led astray to a position that might be a poor witness to our Lord." Sturniolo later said he did not intend the letter to be anti-Semitic.

Slave Labour Talks Tough Going

BERLIN — Negotiators attempting to create a compensation fund for Nazi-era slave and forced labourers have all but engaged in a full-fledged street fight.

But despite the current climate of the talks, the sparring may just be the storm before a final calm.

"An agreement is closer than you might expect," and may be reached by the end of this month, said a source close to the talks.

Just the same, getting to the finish line is proving difficult, as negotiators argue about billions of dollars and threaten postponement of the talks.

Germany's largest industries and the German government last month offered $3.3 billion (US) to settle the claims of hundreds of thousands of workers who were forced to toil in factories and on farms to help fuel the Nazi war machine.

Jewish groups blasted the offer as shameful and miserly. Victims' lawyers demanded $28 billion.

Now, it appears likely that the next round of the talks, scheduled for the middle of November, will be postponed so mediators can reach a compromise.

Toronto couple killed in EgyptAir crash

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mark and Anna Kogan loved to travel, and were looking forward to spending two weeks in Israel with friends and relatives, and two weeks touring Egypt.

They never made it.

The Toronto Jewish couple were among 22 Canadians who perished aboard EgyptAir flight 990 when it plunged into the ocean 30 minutes after leaving New York on Oct. 31.

The Kogans also loved their adopted homeland, Canada, where they arrived in 1974 from Leningrad, after having spent eight months in an Italian transit centre with other Soviet Jewish emigres.

Once here, they worked to make life easier for fellow newcomers.

"They helped a lot of people. I can't tell you how many people loved them," the Kogans' distraught only child, Elena, a 36-year-old immigration consultant, told The CJN.

Mark Kogan, 63, was a retired mechanical and hydraulic engineer, while his wife, 65, had been a popular science teacher at Greenwood Secondary School from 1984 to 1995, where flags flew at half-staff last week.

Anna Kogan had also taught high school science in the Soviet Union.

The couple retired a few years ago, and were spending most of their time at their cottage near Peterborough, added Elena, who drove her parents to Toronto's airport, where they caught a flight to New York.

They became active in Beth Israel Congregation, Peterborough's only synagogue.

The couple lived in Hamilton for their first five years in Canada and were active members of that city's Beth Jacob Congregation, Elena said.

Her mother was active in Hamil-

The 'fighter' is back

Very few Canadian Jews have not been the beneficiaries of the civic, artistic athletic, philanthropic, commercial or scientific achievements of their co-religionists who have lived, at one time or another, in Montreal.

The history of Jewish life in Montreal dates from the mid 1700s. On a cold day, late in December in 1768, 15 Jews came together on St. James Street in Montreal to form the first Jewish congregation in Canada, Shearith Israel. The synagogue soon became known as the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, the name it bears to this day, although its address has changed a number of times.

From the founding of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, to the entrepreneurial pioneering of the Harts, Davids, Franks and Solomons, the modern philanthropy of the Bronfman and Cummings families or the literature and poetry of Klein, Layton, Cohen and Kattan, the Jews of Montreal have been like a band of energetic and passionate sculptors helping to draw out from the diversity, excitement and opportunity of "the new Canadian land," the shape and definition of engaged, caring Jewish communal life.

Ever since its founding, more than 200 years ago, Jewish communal life in Montreal has become renowned in North America for the breadth and inter-relatedness of its myriad cultural, religious, educational, social and health services.

As we all know, however, the advent, of activist separatism in the mid-1970s inspired a measure of economic uncertainty that profoundly affected Quebec's anglophone minority.

The Jewish community, counted primarily within that minority, was not spared some of the uncertainty's impact.

Like a fighter hit by a sudden, low blow, the Jewish community of Montreal seemed tentative, buckled somewhat by the economic uncertainties of the past few years.

But last week it became clear to all that the fighter has refound his strength and his posture.

On Nov. 4, the Jewish community of Montreal officially dedicated and celebrated its new Community Campus. (See related story elsewhere in the paper.)

The $30 million campus is the largest project ever undertaken by the Montreal Jewish community. When completed. it will span four city blocks and will house 23 of the Jewish community's social service and philanthropic agencies. It comprises a north and south campus.

The north campus is an expansion and renovation of the existing FEDERATION CJA headquarters. The south campus is an expansion and renovation of the YM-YWHA and Saidye Bronfman Centre: two newly-strengthened parts to a newly-invigorated, better whole.

As befitting the importance of the occasion, the event was an elegant gala. The heads of three levels of government, along with a number of other dignitaries, attended. They all conveyed greetings; imparted words of hope and aspiration and sent forth the unmistakable message that the "fighter" is back in full fighting trim, standing confidently at centre ring.

Representing the federal government, was the deputy prime minister, Herb Gray. Invoking Pirkei Avot, the deputy prime minister compared the community and its campus to a "tree by the water," taking root, giving and gaining both strength and comfort to all who are in its vicinity. "The Montreal Jewish Community Campus (MJCC)" Gray averred, "would be the cornerstone of the Montreal Jewish community."

Premier Lucien Bouchard urged the 1,000 people at the gathering "to be active and to look bravely at the future."

"For us," the premier added, "the MJCC symbolizes the common home we wish to share with all Quebec's Jews. We want to deepen the relationship and to deepen the ties."

To my mind, the most moving of the three governmental speakers was Montreal Mayor Pierre Bourque.

Speaking softly, without notes, he offered brief, plaintive remarks that gave testimony of a personal rather than an institutional, response to the opening of the MJCC.

"I visited your synagogues where I prayed with you. I visited your Jewish schools where I danced with you and celebrated with you. And I visited Israel where I planted flowers.

"The Jewish community," the mayor concluded "is giving to Montreal a will of continuity. You have always taught me about the future and about courage."

The future and the courage to always imagine a better one, were indeed, the key themes of the evening.

No one spoke more effectively about the future than did Stanley Plotnick, the outgoing president of FEDERATION CJA, and the man widely praised as the driving force behind the new campus.

The values embodied by the MJCC, Plotnick promised, will be "kindness, compassion, knowledge, culture and understanding."

And, as a result, "we, the Montreal Jewish community stand a little prouder and a lot more encouraged about the future."

All Canadian Jews and Canadians stand to benefit as a result.

Women faced more violations

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women suffered in the Holocaust both as Jews and as women, says an associate professor at York University.

"In some measure, what happened was not just a violation of humans, but a violation of women," said Prof. Sara Horowitz, a former director of Jewish Studies at the University of Delaware and author of Voicing the Void: Muteness and Memory in Holocaust Fiction.

Horowitz spoke at a recent Holocaust Education week event sponsored by National Council of Jewish Women and Jewish Women's Federation, and co-sponsored by Great Gulf Homes Charitable Foundation.

When she was asked by her students about women in the Holocaust, Horowitz said, she could not find many sources written by women. "Men were being the voice of women. The perspectives of men and women can both be different, yet they are both truthful.

"Both men and women were slated for murder; both endured disease, epidemics, famine and massive losses, and they both had to find ways to survive, yet there were differences," said Horowitz.

Women were better adapted to survive in the ghettos, she said, because they could endure lower rations of food. "More able bodied women were immediately killed at the concentration camps, however, because they had babies in their arms, or were pregnant. Men of the same age were given a chance to live longer."

In hiding, men were endangered by their circumcision, said Horowitz. "Women had no such marker, and because of this, they served as couriers and did sabotage work."

Pregnancy, she said, is usually a cause of joy and sharing, but in the ghettos and in hiding, a baby meant danger. "A baby's cry could give people away; a baby was sometimes killed so nine or 10 people could live."

In the camps, said Horowitz, the situation was more radical. Pregnancies were often kept secret, babies were delivered in secret, and then they were killed in secret. Mothers were told the baby was stillborn. "It was cruel, but in that context, it was an act of bravery. We cannot bring in our conventional way of thinking."

In their memoirs of the Holocaust, said Horowitz, women often talked about their final words with their mother. "Some women had a note from their mother, written in case they did not meet up again.

"They were told to be strong and survive, and then tell their story. Psychologically, girls saw this as permission to survive – [not to feel guilty.]"

Women in the camps often saw each other as surrogate family, said Horowitz. "They would find a substitute mother or daughter and look out for each other. Men, on the other hand, tended to look after themselves. Their memories are of what 'I' did, while women bonded in small groups and nurtured each other."

Although more and more information is emerging about women in the Holocaust, the subject of sexual abuse "seems to fall outside of what most women talk about. Maybe they were ashamed to talk about what happened to them, or maybe they were afraid it would put them outside the marriage market. This is very disturbing, because people did what they had to do to survive.

"In life in general, people are uncomfortable about [sexual] issues, but it is surprising that with regards to the Holocaust, it is still out of bounds to talk about it, because at that time, people were driven to extreme behavior."

Asked how women dealt with their lives after experiencing such horrors, Horowitz said that "they don't get beyond the sadness, they learn to live with it, and then embrace life. They learn to live with the sorrow rather than having it take over their lives."

Arbour labels war criminals

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Louise Arbour believes in being very precise.

War criminals have been charged with "murder, extermination, rape, torture, enslavement, deportation, persecution on ethnic, racial or religious grounds.

Holocaust Education Week

"That's what they are: murderers, torturers, rapists," said the Canadian Supreme Court Justice in a recent talk.

The term "war criminal" makes it too easy to suggest that the person is actually a war hero, she said.

Arbour, former chief prosecutor for the International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, was speaking at a luncheon at the Sheraton Centre Hotel as part of Holocaust Education Week. The event was sponsored by the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada.

Arbour feels she doesn't have the intellectual or emotional distance to achieve the kind of wisdom and understanding she would like following her three-year stint with the international tribunals established by the United Nations Security Council.

She has a lot more questions than answers, she said.

There are great hopes that a permanent international criminal court will be put in place, Arbour said.

The existence of such a court would reinforce national prosecutions, even in countries not supportive of an international court, she said.

National courts would likely have to deal with retroactive cases, which would be outside the international court's jurisdiction.

Among the issues Arbour raised was how to deal with national leaders compared with the prosecution of their "willing executioners.

"Maybe in the long run the international forum would be seen as more appropriate for leadership cases."

Arbour also raised the need to examine the "social pathology" behind the crimes.

The subject of her talk – War Criminals, 1999 – could not be more topical, Arbour said, noting the "huge amount of intellectual activity and action around this issue," particularly in regard to the recent extradition cases of Augusto Pinochet and Maurice Papon.

Arbour believes more has been accomplished in the past five years, than in the preceding 50, to bring to account some of the worst offenders.

Holocaust-Kosovo comparison said inappropriate but effective

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The use of Holocaust imagery to describe the crisis in Kosovo was inappropriate, but it did spur Western powers to act, says the Canadian former commander of UN peacekeeping forces in Bosnia.

Holocaust Education Week

Retired Maj.-Gen. Lewis MacKenzie says he was "personally offended" by the comparisons of the tragedy in Kosovo to the Jewish experience during World War II because it was "an insult to the survivors and victims of the Holocaust."

But at the same, MacKenzie told an audience last week as part of Holocaust Education Week, "words like 'genocide,' 'concentration camp' and 'Holocaust' – those terms had a significant impact on the decision-making process of Western leaders.

"The term 'genocide' draws a moral and legal obligation to intervene."

In a talk at Asbury & West United Church sponsored by the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, MacKenzie noted that during the Holocaust, Jews were shipped by trains to their deaths, whereas ethnic Albanian Kosovars – "as despicable as the act was" – were put on trains to be sent out of the country.

"We have to be careful how we use simplistic, black-and-white terms like 'Holocaust,'" MacKenzie said. "We mustn't allow it."

But the West may have been moved by those terms, he conceded, because at first, the international community was prepared only to deliver food and medicine to Kosovo and not to engage in a war.

MacKenzie also noted that whereas the UN was quick to describe events in Kosovo as genocide, it refused to use the same term in Rwanda, where at least 500,000 people were butchered in the summer of 1994.

There is "a degree of racism in that, no doubt," he said.

MacKenzie, who headed peacekeeping troops in Bosnia in 1991, said there are 43 wars and armed conflicts raging in the world today. The notion of peacekeeping, introduced by former Canadian prime minister Lester Pearson, has changed over the years.

"Today, rarely do we send people for peacekeeping because there is no peace to keep," Mackenzie said. A more accurate term would be "peace enforcers, because sometimes it is necessary to kill to keep peace."

Despite that, peacekeeping, with which Canada is still closely associated on the international stage, has worked 14 times between the 1956 Suez crisis and 1991 in Bosnia, he said.

Medical school ran in Warsaw ghetto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A clandestine underground medical school operated in the Warsaw ghetto for 15 months under the guise of a trade school.

Dr. Charles Roland, the Jason Hannah professor emeritus in the history of medicine at McMaster University in Hamilton, spoke about the underground medical school at Kehillat Shaarei Torah during Holocaust Education Week.

"The Nazis didn't once come to inspect the course which was supposed to train workers to fight epidemics because the Germans were afraid their soldiers would get typhus," Roland said.

As it turned out, he said, of the 100,000 Jews who died in the ghetto, only three percent had typhus, but a large number of children died of tuberculosis or diphtheria.

The Nazis were so afraid of typhus that when the death of one resident of a large apartment block was attributed to typhus, the entire block was quarantined for weeks. This led to food smuggling. The smuggling was encouraged by the Nazis who set a limit of 173 calories a day for ghetto residents.

"The important thing is that 50 of the 500 medical students survived and 25 to 30 went on to become physicians, some of them completing their education at the University of Warsaw which gave them credit for attending the underground school," Roland said.

He noted that at least one of the faculty and a few of its graduates came to Canada to practice medicine.

The underground school made important advances in the study of human starvation, its faculty having ready access to those in the ghetto who were dying of hunger, he said.

The school struggled along with a few textbooks and instruments, some of which were smuggled out of Polish hospitals or universities. The books and instruments were passed from one student to another.

Roland revealed that when the ghetto was demolished in July of 1942, some of the underground-school teachers used poison to kill children in a ghetto hospital who were to be sent to Treblinka. Some patients jumped off the roof to their deaths when the news of the demolition came, he reported.

Asked by a member of the audience if the poisoning was ethical, Roland noted that a female physician, one of those who had administered the poison, wrote in a book that she has no regrets and that she did the right thing.

The makeshift hospitals in the ghetto were so overcrowded that there were three patients to a bed and some patients slept on the floor, Roland said.

About 50 percent of the records that were buried in the ghetto, under the supervision of historian Emanuel Ringelblum, were recovered; and there are copies of much of this material in Yad Vashem, in Jerusalem. A lot of the information has been translated into English.

Toronto laneway named for J.B.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About a dozen people braved a persistent rain for the unveiling last week of the sign marking Joseph Salsberg Lane, located south off Adelaide Street, just west of Bathurst Street.

The late Joseph (J.B.) Salsberg, a politician, social activist, labour leader and CJN columnist, never looked for accolades, according to his brother Nat, who attended the unveiling with his three surviving siblings.

J.B.'s name came to mind immediately when labour historian Geoffrey Ewen was consulted regarding an appropriate name for a new downtown laneway.

City councillor Joe Pantalone – he and fellow councillor, Mario Silva, proposed the street name – paid tribute to Salsberg, recalling his commitment to the advancement of social justice for working people.

"This was his area," said Ewen, co-ordinator of the Canadian studies program at York University's Glendon College. "It seemed to me it was proper that there would be a permanent tribute to him," he told The CJN.

Salsberg, who died in February 1998 at age 95, represented the area on city council and in the provincial legislature, Ewen added.

"I think [J.B.] would have been very pleased," said his youngest brother Bob. Speaking on behalf of his siblings, he said he was proud of the honour bestowed on Salsberg.

With a twinkle in her eye reminiscent of her late brother, Betty Troster said she could hear him laughing. "What are you darn fools doing out in the rain?"

STRANGE!
STRANGE?
SYRIA WONT GIVE US PERMISSION TO GET OUT OF LEBANON
SO WHAT'S "STRANGE"?
...I CANT FIND WHERE WE ASKED FOR SYRIA'S PERMISSION TO GO INTO LEBANON!

On the eleventh hour

Fifty days remain in what has certainly been the bloodiest most horrifically violent century in the history of humankind. Was there ever a decade in this century when human beings were not slaughtering fellow human beings? Even now – in the hills of Chechnya – people are being killed for the sake of nationalisms, regionalisms, and tribalisms. The killing offends humanitarian sensibility.

And yet, though wars – all wars – are brutally monstrous, not all wars are futile. Indeed some wars are just. As the people of Israel know only too well and too sadly, some wars must be fought, though the loss of life will be severe, and irreplaceable.

But not only Israel has come to know this mournful truth.

Barely more than two decades after the last gun fell silent in "the war to end all wars," World War I, most of the democracies on the planet, along with the totalitarian Soviet regime, mobilized to defend themselves against the Nazis and their fascist axis.

Since the end of that war, more than two generations of Canadians have been born and raised. Apart from the fighting in Korea in the early '50s, and in infrequent western-allied campaigns such as Desert Storm in the early '90s and in Bosnia earlier this year, Canadian soldiers have been deployed as peace-keepers not as peace-winners. This is a good thing. But it may lead to memory loss since more Canadians now have no direct memory of the two world wars than those who do. Inevitably, it will become increasingly more difficult to remember the actual faces and stories of the individuals who died in the service of their country.

Thus, if subsequent generations cannot recall who these men and women were, we must every year, resolve to remember that they were, that they fought in far off lands and died there in service of their country.

On the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month let us take to heart the words of the anonymous poet who poignantly suggests how best to express that resolve.

"At the rising of the sun and at its going down,
we remember them.
At the blowing of the wind and in the chill of winter,
we remember them.
At the opening of the buds and in the rebirth of spring,
we remember them.
At the shining of the sun and in the warmth of summer,
we remember them.
At the rustling of the leaves and in the beauty of autumn,
we remember them.
At the beginning of the year and at its end,
we remember them.
When we are weary and in need of strength,
we remember them.
When we are lost and sick at heart,
we remember them.
As long as we live, they too will live for they are now a part of us, as we remember them..."

Another version of slaughter

It's not unusual for the passage of time to distort facts, but the item from JTA about the rededication of the synagogue in Khania, Greece, needs some correction. (CJN, Oct. 21)

Some time after May 5, 1944, and before Oct. 24, 1944, the Germans who garrisoned Khania rounded up all the Jews in town, crowded them aboard a rusty old coaster, towed it out to the middle of Khania Bay, and used it for target practice to calibrate the gunsights on their 88-millimetre ack ack, which were sited on the high mountains around the bay.

The leaky old bucket sank before it could even catch fire, and a pitiful few survivors were left floundering in the water. The Germans then went out in motor boats and threw grenades near these poor souls, which stunned them and made them drown and sink to the bottom of the bay. Just to keep things nice and tidy.

Maybe the head of the prefecture of the Port of Khania (if he's old enough) or his father might be prevailed upon to add a few more details.

Alarmed by U.S. stance

Richard Holbrooke, the new U.S. ambassador to the UN, recently told reporters that the ethnic differences in Kosovo "are just racism, and there's no place for it."

Have American foreign policy makers become so ideologically detached from reality that they can reduce very serious and longstanding historical, religious and political animosities to "racism," as though we were dealing with Ku Klux Klan or neo-Nazis? Serbs and Albanians have been contesting Kosovo for decades, indeed centuries. These are two contending nationalist movements claiming the same territory. Similar battles occur in places such as Cyprus, Kashmir, Quebec, and of course Israel/Palestine.

These quarrels are not about "race," even if demonization and stereotyping sometimes occur as a byproduct.

Will Holbrooke now tell us that the movement to reconstitute a Jewish state, known as Zionism, was a form of racism? Shades of the infamous 1975 UN General Assembly resolution! Has American liberal "multiculturalism" become the utopian successor to the discredited notions that used to be peddled by Marxist theorists?

A lasting impression

The camp of Majdanek was like nothing I had ever seen before. This is the camp that has been left almost untouched since the end of the war. The silence coated the camp and time stood still as I walked in disbelief from barrack to barrack. "How?" and "why?" were the only things that kept racing through my mind. How could a human being do this to other human beings?

As I entered the third barrack, I just stood in the middle of the room, engulfed by millions of pictures.

As I walked in and out of the endless rows of barracks, I became dazed. Then came the barrack filled with shoes, and another filled right to the roof with shoes, and then another. Three full barracks with an endless number of shoes of all sizes and colours. I could smell them, that old, leathery worn-out smell. In disbelief, I walked to the end of the barracks and picked up two tiny children's shoes. I held them in my hands picturing the little girl who wore them. Her image became engraved in my mind and that is what gave me the strength to move on.

From the end of the barracks we crossed through the barbed wire, down a long path to where a huge dome of ashes stood. I sat staring into this overwhelming dome in amazement, not being able to comprehend the number of people who perished here. To all those people who said it never happened, I'm here to tell you it did. I felt their shoes and saw the millions of ashes.

The ashes, as well as the rest of the camp, left a lasting impression in my mind. Above me engraved in stone was a sign above the ashes that read "Let our fate be a warning unto you." From that moment on, I knew I was part of a unique chain of witnesses and I was going to make a difference.

I was going to make sure, "never again."

Kristallnacht: the beginning of the end

By ISRAEL KOPYTO

The year 1938 was a decisive one in the lives of German Jewry. When Adolf Hitler took over the political reins, that year, the opposition to the Fuhrer was silenced and the Nazi hierarchy began the realization of their plans to create a mighty Third Reich.

German foreign minister Joachim von Ribbentrop dispatched a document to all German diplomatic and consular bureaus entitled: The Jewish Question, A Reality In Our Foreign Policy For 1938. In it, he wrote the following: "It is not a coincidence that 1938, the year of our destiny, saw the realization of our plans for a larger and mightier Germany, but also a long step forward to the solution of the Jewish problem."

The document goes on to say: "The Jewish influence and the Jewish corruption of our political, economic and cultural lives brought a lot more harm to us than enemy action from the outside world. This sickness on the bodies of our nation must be eradicated this year, before the German Reich can put up a fight against the hatred of the world around us."

This was the beginning of the end for German Jews in particular, and for European Jews in general. The National-Socialist party was very strong in 1938. The Fuhrer removed from the government the last representatives of other parties, including the leaders of the military. No one dared to protest.

Hitler appointed his close friends and coworkers in the Nazi party to the leading positions in the German government and in the armed forces. He also decided in the same year that the time had come to realize his great plans for Germany. At the beginning of that fateful year, he openly declared that he was ready to show the whole world the German superiority, even if it had to be through war.

The Jews of Germany were not, unfortunately, forgotten in the grand scheme of the Nazi party. The opposite was true. The Jewish population and the "Jewish problem" figured prominently in these plans. The leaders of the Third Reich constantly expressed their hatred for the Jewish people and emphasized their plans for the disposal of the Jews forever.

As early as April 1933, even before Hitler was secure in his position, there were bloody anti-Jewish demonstrations, and a number of racially motivated laws against Jews were proclaimed. This prompted about 37,000 Jews to leave Germany. In the following few years, however, the situation became somewhat calmer, and the German Jews embraced a false hope for better times.

But better times were not to be. The Nazi leadership was determined to force the German Jews to leave the country. In September 1935, a number of anti-Jewish laws were enacted in Nuremberg. But Jewish emigration from Germany did not increase. Between 1934 and 1937, only 65,000 Jews left Germany.

Half of these emigrants remained in Europe, a third of them in France. The vast majority perished together with the other European Jews, and 27 percent went to Palestine.

Despite the fact that the annual quotas allowed 123,000 German Jews to come to the United States, only 27,000 settled there between 1933 and 1937.

Oranienburg Street Synagogue in Berlin, Nov. 9, 1938.

The Nazi regime decided to accelerate passage of their racial laws. In quick succession, stronger anti-Jewish laws were proclaimed, in order to make the lives of their Jewish citizens even more intolerable.

In 1937, the Soviet Union expelled a large number of Germans. As revenge, the Nazi government deported 500 Russian Jews living in Germany. The Soviet Union did not accept the deportees. With no common border between the two countries, the Nazis interned these Jews in a concentration camp – and no outside government interceded.

The culmination for German Jewry began on the night of Nov. 9, 1938, which has become known as Kristallnacht. On that night, the Hitler regime unleashed an orchestrated nationwide pogrom against the Jewish population, their places of worship, their institutions, their homes and their businesses. It lasted for three terrifying days. As a pretext for this indescribably bloody orgy, the Nazis used the assassination of a minor German diplomat in France by a young Jewish man, Hershel Grynszpan.

Grynszpan was born in Hanover, Germany, to Jewish parents of Polish extraction. At 17, he left home and settled in Paris, where a number of German Jews of Polish extraction had settled to try to avoid the reach of the Nazi laws against foreign-born Jews.

On Nov. 3, 1938, Grynszpan received a letter from his sister Bertha in Hanover. In despair she informed him that the German police had surrounded the old Jewish quarter in Hanover where about 680 Polish Jews lived, including Grynszpan's parents and their children. The Jews were stripped of their citizenship and property, and brutally shipped to the Polish border town of Zbonszyn to be sent to Poland.

The Hanover Jews were among 15,000 Polish-born Jews to be so deported to Poland. But the Polish authorities did not accept these Jews and they remained destitute in a no-man's land, without food, money or life's other necessities.

Young Grynszpan was very anxious about the fate of his family and that of other Jewish victims. He was a proud Jew, and decided to raise the world's awareness of the indignities heaped upon the Jews. He wanted to draw attention to Jewish suffering, even if it meant his own death.

On Nov. 6, he purchased a gun. The next day, he made his way to the German Embassy in Paris. At the gate, he explained in perfect German that he must personally deliver an important document to the ambassador. The ambassador and other senior diplomats were away, and Grynszpan was ushered into the office of the third embassy secretary, Ernst von Roth. When the secretary asked for the document, the enraged youth drew his revolver and pumped five bullets into the startled secretary, shouting: "This is in revenge for my family and the other 15,000 Polish-born Jews." Two days later, the mortally wounded von Roth died.

Grynszpan was arrested by the French police, but somehow managed to escape from them. He was less than 20 years old when he was captured by the Gestapo after the German army occupied Paris, and he disappeared without a trace. It is assumed that he died in the cellars of the Gestapo during his interrogation. His heroism and martyrdom will forever be remembered.

The death of von Roth was an instant excuse for the Nazi hierarchy to launch their widespread pogrom against the Jews. The regional leaders of the Nazi party received instructions from Reinhard Heydrich and Josef Goebbels that included precise plans on how to punish the Jews for the assassination in Paris. At the same time the German police received orders not to interfere with the way the Nazi units went about their "job."

And so the Nazi "Sturm-Troopers" executed the orders of the Reichsbureau. Starting with the night of Nov. 9, and for three days following, they drowned the German Jews in blood. They robbed, beat and murdered men, women and children. They destroyed Jewish homes and businesses. They set fire to Jewish synagogues and prayerhouses, and 76 were totally burned to the ground, among them some of the oldest synagogues in Europe.

Hundreds of Jews were murdered during the three days. The Nazis announced that 36 had died and 36 had been wounded. Diplomatic observers and foreign journalists wrote about hundreds Jewish victims, young and old, whose bodies lay scattered on the streets. Official sources announced that throughout the land, 7,500 businesses and markets had been destroyed. The truth, as it was later learned, was much higher.

The designation Kristallnacht was coined by the German insurance industry because of all the broken glass on the streets, which reflected the fires of the burning Jewish homes, businesses and places of worship.

At the same time, Austria, which since March 13 was part of Nazi Germany, conducted its own Kristallnacht, not less brutal than Germany's. The Austrian Nazis wanted to impress the Fuhrer and show that they could be more vicious than their German party brothers. The Nazi regime in Austria usurped Jewish possessions and used the proceeds to arm the German military.

And the world was silent. This silence gave the Hitler regime more courage to proceed with its savage persecution of German Jewry. Kristallnacht was the first official German pogrom against Jews, but alas, not the last one. It was also the beginning of an almost seven-year plan to annihilate the Jews.

The world was silent on the night of Nov. 9, 1938, and was silent in the following days, nights, months and years, when the Nazi murderers sowed death and destruction all over the world.

Jews in Canada

Several months ago, I received a little pamphlet containing the transcript of a lecture that Prof. Irving Abella had presented at York University. He is, without question, Canada's best known historian, the first occupant of the J. Richard Shiff Chair for the Study of Canadian Jewry. His lecture — which was actually given a year ago — was entitled Canadian Jewry: Past, Present and Future.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I write about it now because what Abella had to say deserves the widest attention. Better than anyone else I know, he was able to characterize in trenchant terms both the Jewish community and the nation in which we live. Here are just a few of his observations:

Anyone who speaks or writes about Canadian Jewry inevitably compares it to the much larger community to the south. There, the emphasis lies with the rights of individuals, Abella says, while Canadian historical roots involve the constitutional rights of the two founding groups, the French and the English, as "distinct, unassimilated, and theoretically of equal worth and entitlement. Unlike the United States, where individualism promoted assimilation, Canada has always conceded that the right to integrate based on differences has as much legal and political integrity as the right to assimilate." In other words, to the south of us is a melting pot, a concept strange to Canadians.

Consequently, ours is a pluralistic culture, which we like to call "the Canadian mosaic." That is why we give to each of our ethnic and religious minorities — and in that sense every group is a minority — the right to celebrate its own traditions without the compulsion to be someone else. Perhaps that is also the reason why south of the border there is continual racial tension, while in Canada we have somehow reasonably managed to accommodate the needs of our constituencies. Though not all of them are happy and would like to see changes, we have so far been able to solve such differences peacefully.

Abella strongly denies that Canadian multiculturalism is either a weakness or a failure. Those who take that view believe multiculturalism to be the origin for the relatively low level of patriotism in Canada. But when I arrived in Canada in 1961, long before Pierre Trudeau had introduced his multicultural vision, I already noted the absence of the kind of patriotism existing in the United States. I found this absence both unusual and yet in its own way most attractive, for it could never lead to the kind of chauvinistic excesses occasionally found in the States.

Abella points out, however, that assimilation has infected Canadian Jewry as well. The factors that made for Jewish cohesion are weakening, he says, for "aside from Holocaust remembrance, what has united all Jews has been the concern for an embattled Israel and for oppressed Jewish communities throughout the world. These have helped shape our identity…What aside from religion will bind Jews together in the future?" That is indeed a question worth pondering.

Those interested in receiving Abella's paper might wish to ask the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University if copies can still be obtained.

Thinking about the Pope

The provocative title of a recent book, Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII, by John Cornwall, is certain to attract a readership beyond the Catholic population of the English-speaking world. It grapples with issues that have a bearing on the behaviour of Pius XII during the era of Nazi rule in Europe. It also deals with the relationship between the Vatican and the organized Jewish community, as well as that between ordinary Jews and Catholics who struggle towards dialogue.

Joan M. Gerber in Vancouver

The beatification of Pius XII was begun in 1965 (he died in 1958). The present Pope has reactivated the drive to have him declared a saint, thus opening once more the acrimonious debate over the role of the Vatican during the Holocaust.

Pius XII was born in 1876. He entered a church that faced the perceived threats of modernity, especially the loosening of control by the Vatican over national churches, and calls for local autonomy and liturgical reform. As Cardinal and then Pope, Pius XII fought tirelessly to preserve the central authority of the Vatican as sole spokesman on all affairs and attitudes Catholic.

In other words, in order for the Vatican and the Pope to remain the sole voice of Catholic doctrine and its social conscience, Pius XII was willing to sign concordats with Mussolini and then with Hitler. In return, the Fascists recognized that sole authority and the Pope therefore remained silent when millions (including Polish Catholic countrymen of the present Pope) went to the gas chambers.

This is a stinging indictment of bureaucracy run wild. To believe that a Pope would allow the murder of millions of human beings, without saying a meaningful word in humanity's defense, is a terrible thought.

Even worse for Jews is the thought that a man so bloodied by inaction would become a venerated saint of the Catholic Church. Coming on the heels of the grant of sainthood to the nun Edith Stein, a Jewish convert to Catholicism who died in the Holocaust, the saintliness of Pius XII is hard for us to take.

From the day that Pope Urban II declared the first crusade in 1095, uneasy relations between Jews and Christians in Europe became poisoned by centuries of exile, blood libels, restrictions on personal and religious life, and, of course, periods of pogrom.

Sadly, the Crusades were perpetrated not for holy reasons but for reasons internal to the Church, reasons not altogether different from those facing Pius XII: recognition of the supremacy of the Papacy. For Urban II, it was the supremacy of Rome over Byzantium and control over unruly princes and kings (and their armies). Like Pius XII, Urban was erecting a bulwark against diminishment of Vatican control.

Is it, however, any of our business whom the Vatican decides to canonize? And what effect will this have on our daily discourse? I believe it is our business and it will have an effect.

Slowly and laboriously, Jews and Christians have begun building bridges towards each other. Hesitantly at first, then spurred by the all-too-brief papacy of Pope John XXIII, the two entities have tried to speak across the chasms filled with bodies and mutual distrust that made this the bloodiest century for the Jews since the 12th. For the Pope now to enable the sainthood of a man who represents the unforgivable silence of a generation regarding the Holocaust, would be devastating to any future understanding.

The present Pope has already declared his intent to journey to "Ur of the Chaldees," (currently Iraq). In honor of what, I'm not too sure. Judaism has some connection to this pile of rubble, but Christianity does not. Nor is our memory of Ur too benign. Father Abraham was fleeing the culture of Ur, not trying to build upon its idolatry.

And the Pope's hesitation about coming to Israel? That really angers. Ur but not Jerusalem? Saddam but not Barak? Surely not.

This kind of waffling and pontificating (no pun intended) will only harm relations between the Vatican and Israel on one hand, and, on the other, damage our attempts through dialogue to put things right after so many centuries of hate.

What can begin to atone for the silence of Pius XII? For the Pope to reject Saddam and all his works; denounce the oppression and murder of his own people; announce that John Paul and his retinue will begin the new century with a bold visit to Israel and the Palestinian areas, to sites holy to Christians and those holy to Jews; insist that the major task of all persons of faith is peace. And leave the issue of Pius XII's sainthood for the generations to come.

An antidote to post Zionism

As readers of this column know, I have spent my last two sabbaticals as a visiting professor at Hebrew University. One of my first observations was that colleagues at the Hebrew University did not engage in casual conversation.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Indeed, it is quite possible that Israelis, generally, don't engage in casual conversation. Given the serious issues that confront them on a daily basis, every discussion is of grave national import. Positions are strongly held and views are expressed with great fervour. Conversations occasionally concern Israel-Diaspora relations. During one such conversation, a colleague opined: "There are no more Zionists, either inside the state or in the Galut (Diaspora)."

I wondered: " Was he right? Are there any Zionists left out there?" After all, the State of Israel was established more than 50 years ago. Israel is no longer the "new kid on the block." Furthermore, it is relatively secure, both militarily and economically.

It is difficult to view the shoppers strolling the mall at Malcha or the sunbathers at Nitzanim Beach as modern day chalutzim (pioneers). The people sitting in the restaurants are not deeply involved in debating the merits of political Zionism versus spiritual Zionism. They are simply citizens of a state who want to get on with their lives: to earn a living, provide for their families, and ensure the safety of their children.

Before we went on our first sabbatical, I envisioned – based upon my years of Zionist camping experience – that people would invite us to join them around the bonfire where we would sing the old Zionist pioneering songs. (Admittedly, I was a bit naive.) In fact, when people entertain in Israel, it is pretty much as we do here in North America.

As for Jews in the Diaspora, we travel to Israel more than ever. Most, however, see it as a nice vacation spot. "Where should we go this year for Pesach? I'm tired of Palm Springs. Let's go to Netanya!" It is a mitzvah to visit Eretz Yisrael, but there is seldom a sense of mitzvah in this type of visit.

Similarly, there is no sense of mitzvah when we send our children. Even when our youth go on a year program, it is more often to bridge the transition between high school and university or as a break during university than it is with any sense of Zionist fervour.

When I was a teenager, my mother would not let me go to Israel on a year program. She was afraid I would stay there permanently. I doubt any of us worries about that with our children: "I support the State of Israel – it's a nice place to visit!" Perhaps my colleague was right – there are no more Zionists!

This all came to mind recently when I attended a meeting of a Jewish organization whose object is to provide support for the State of Israel. One person began a sentence with the phrase: "Now that we are in the post-Zionist era…" Is the great Zionist project – the creation of the State of Israel, the establishment of its national institutions, the assurance of its viability and long-term security, and the ingathering of the exiles – complete? Is the era of Zionism really at an end? I hope not.

We should realize that, although the relationship between the state and Diaspora Jewry may change over time, the Zionist project is not concluded. It is still a work in progress. Many large issues face the State of Israel. First and foremost, is the issue of peace and security. And there are many other internal issues that will have to be faced. Chief among these is the balancing of secular and religious interests. The Basic Laws of the State define Israel as "Jewish and democratic." Determining what this means will take a great deal of work in the coming years.

There is still an important role for Zionists to play, both in Israel and in the Diaspora, in determining the future character of the state and its relationship to world Jewry. Jews the world over share a common history. We must recognize our shared destiny as well.

We must not succumb to complacency or apathy concerning Israel. There is an antidote to this creeping post-Zionist consciousness that seems to be affecting us. Education is the first step on the path to placing Zionism at the forefront of the consciousness of Diaspora Jewry. We need to learn the basics: Zionist ideology, the history of Jewry and the State of Israel, and the geopolitical and domestic issues which confront Israel. Zionist organizations have a special responsibility to co-operate in the active promotion of a mass education campaign to rejuvenate the Zionist consciousness of Canadian Jewry.

Perhaps, then, our era will not be labelled as "post-Zionist," but rather as the "rebirth of Zionism."

The Kirshner File

Pope John Paul II's relationship with Jews

Karol Wojtyla, better known as John Paul II, has forged a new and improved relationship with Jews and Israel, according to George Weigel, author of Witness to Hope (HarperCollins), the newest biography of the current Pope.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Weigel, an American Catholic theologian who personally knows and clearly admires this pope, the first Polish one, presents a convincing case that he has striven to be a friend to the Jewish people and Israel.

Born in Wadowice, a town with a substantial Jewish population, he grew up with Jews. Influenced by his boyhood friendships with Jews, his father's lessons in tolerance, his pastor's teaching that anti-Semitism was antithetical to the Gospels and his first-hand knowledge of the Holocaust, he formed a distinctive sensitivity to Jewish pain.

In an interview, Weigel, who was here to promote his book, said, "The Pope has a profound sense that the murder of Jews was a blow to the richness of European culture."

During the German occupation of Poland, he was a member of UNIA, a clandestine cultural group aligned to Zagota, the Council to Help Jews. While indifference and hostility all too often characterized Polish attitudes to Jews, the Poles in Zagota were refreshingly philo-Semitic. By Weigel's estimate, they supplied false identity papers for some 50,000 Jews and hid about 2,500 Jewish children.

Deeply affected by the Nazi rape of Poland, the young Wojtyla urged students in postwar Poland to care for abandoned and neglected Jewish cemeteries. Years later, when he was Pope, he said, "We must remember the Shoah, that cruel plan to exterminate... our Jewish brothers and sisters..."

Under his guidance, the Vatican's Commission on Religious Relations with the Jews published We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah in 1994, a document which described the Holocaust as an "unspeakable tragedy." We Remember was somewhat flawed, failing to take account of the fact that historic Christian anti-Semitism laid the groundwork for Nazi genocide.

On balance, it set the right tone for Christian-Jewish dialogue, though Weigel suggested that it would have been more credible had it not drawn such a neat distinction between Christian anti-Judaism and Nazi anti-Semitism. Weigel acknowledged that traditional anti-Jewish teachings dulled and weakened Christians' resistance to Germany's race-based anti-Semitism.

Asked whether We Remember was a case of too little, too late, as some Jews have stated, Weigel said that it represented an honest attempt by the Vatican to confront the Holocaust. "It was a step forward." But he hastened to add that the Pope will probably issue an addendum in 2000 to clarify "the bitter history of Jewish-Christian relations."

The first pope to visit a synagogue, Pope John Paul II believes that interfaith dialogue is a religious imperative and an expression of "divine wisdom." In line with these views, he has denounced "pagan anti-Semitism," and acknowledged that "erroneous and unjust" interpretations of the Christian Bible have contributed to "a lulling of conscience" among Christians.

Weigel believes that the Pope has tried to deepen Jewish-Christian relations by building on the achievements of Vatican II. He has done so by coming to terms with "the lessons and burdens of history" and by "retooling" Roman Catholic worship and education so that it more adequately reflects the church's debt to its Jewish roots.

Pope John Paul II

Now, said Weigel, the Pope proposes "a genuine theological encounter of the kind not seen in 1,900 years." This, he claimed, is not proselytism.

Regarding the Carmelite convent controversy, which roiled Jewish-Catholic relations in the 1980s and 1990s, Weigel suggested that both sides inflamed the situation. He is critical of Rabbi Abraham Weiss of New York City for having stormed the convent. He takes Cardinal Jozef Glemp to task for having dredged up anti-Semitic stereotypes. And he implies that the Pope should have intervened earlier.

Weigel's analysis of the Vatican's decision to establish formal diplomatic ties with Israel in 1993 contains fresh information.

In 1987, the Pope, who caused a titter by meeting Yasser Arafat in 1982, declared that there were "no theological reasons" in Catholic doctrine for the Vatican not to forge ties with Israel. Following the 1991 Madrid Middle East peace conference, the Vatican developed a blueprint for negotiating such relations.

Interestingly enough, the strategy was devised by Father David-Maria Jaeger, a convert to Christianity who is still the only Israeli Jew to have been ordained as a priest.

Weigel is of the view that Vatican relations with Israel cleared away a major obstacle to the advancement of Jewish-Christian ties.

Pope John Paul II will visit Israel next spring despite a Vatican warning that he may cancel his trip, said Weigel. The Vatican warned Israel recently that its decision to allow the construction of a mosque next to a historic basilica in Nazareth – the boyhood home of Jesus – could jeopardize a papal visit to mark the start of Christianity's third millennium.

Weigel scoffed at the report that the brewing controversy would result in the cancellation of the trip. "He'll visit Israel in March 2000," said Weigel. "He'll be on a religious pilgrimage, and won't let it be deflected by local politics."

A senior fellow of the Ethics and Public Policy Center in Washington, D.C., Weigel disclosed that the Pope, criticism notwithstanding, intends to go through with a visit to Iraq later this year so that he can pray at Abraham's birthplace in Ur.

"The Pope is going to visit Abraham, not Saddam Hussein," said Weigel. "Saddam will get a handshake at the airport. The Pope won't let himself be used by Saddam."

Weigel blasted John Cornwell's new book, Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII. Cornwell claims that Pius XII's ingrained anti-Semitism contributed to his refusal to condemn unequivocally Nazi policy toward Jews.

"It's full of inaccuracies. It's shoddy, third-rate scholarship. The material was run through a filter of extreme animus. Pius XII was not Hitler's Pope. This is a comic, not history."

In Weigel's opinion, Pius XII was not an anti-Semite. Weigel admitted, however, that his characterization of Jewish revolutionaries in Munich, Germany, as "a gang of young women of dubious appearance, Jews like all the rest of them," was needlessly provocative.

"There is a reasonable argument whether Jews would have been better or worse off had Pius XII spoken out," according to Weigel. Pius XII apparently believed that too strong a denunciation of Germany would have worsened the situation for Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe.

"Whether that was an accurate judgment is something we'll be arguing about for 500 years."

Weigel said that he gave refuge to about 3,000 Jews in the Vatican during World War II. During this period, 70 Jewish children were born in his summer residence. "These are not the acts of an anti-Semite." And, Weigel pointed out, the Vatican denounced Germany's anti-Semitic race laws.

Weigel said that Austrian President Kurt Waldheim forced Pope John Paul II's hand when he demanded a papal audience in 1987. Waldheim, he implied, should not have placed the Pope in such a predicament.

Yet, as "the democratically elected head of a historically Catholic country," Waldheim could not be shunned, Weigel suggested.

Town's beauty marred by blood-chilling sight

By
MAREK SIEMIATYCKTI

The following text concerns the author's stay in a small village, where he found temporary refuge after spending a couple of years masquerading as a Catholic in Warsaw, and had many close calls with being found out. It is excerpted from the author's memoirs.

Guest Voices

I must relate here something about the town of Novy Sanch. It was an exceptionally beautiful place, almost untouched by the war operations. A magnificent chain of mountains circles the town, and a pretty river goes through the middle (which served as a skating rink in winter time). The winter climate of that year 1944-45 was exceptionally pleasant; there was little dampness, the cold was dry and it snowed almost every day, replenishing the crisp white clean cover for many weeks. The natural beauty of this town was a needed source of calm and relaxation.

However, in this town that was such an oasis, was a source of bitterness that would daily overwhelm me, and make my warm blood freeze. The sidewalks of most streets in this town had recently been repaved. But, instead of using regular cobblestones, the authorities had paved the sidewalks with gravestones from Jewish cemeteries, some of them centuries old. The gravestones were laid into the ground with Hebrew names and religious epigrams facing the heavens like a contemptuous challenge to the Jewish God.

All of these Davids, Leahs, Abrahams, Saras, Rachels, Judiths and Ruths spoke to me. I heard their pitiful, mournful, soft crying questions: "Why were we expelled from our resting places? Will tender voices from our descendants ever come near to console us? Will warm tears from our children ever fall on our graves to warm our cold, dead bones? Will they set foot by our graves to say a Kaddish for our souls?"

As I had to cross over their gravestones daily, I could not ignore their pleas. I had to silently whisper the "Kaddish" for all of them, deceased and desolate, expelled from their resting place, their souls longing for peace. When I did this, I sensed their presence and I felt them revive and respond with a quiet collective whisper, like the rush from a fresh natural mountain stream. They responded: "We are not abandoned. We are not forgotten. They will come again, with their sighs, their tears, and their prayers. We will be remembered..."

Dear reader, in writing these words which I hope will have an audience someday, I have to insist that these recollections, mystical perhaps, are not invented or exaggerated.

One living Jewish heart possesses enough strength, warmth and affection for millions. The merciful God (blessed his name) will look upon your afflictions and will redeem them for his name's sake. He will lead you to the tranquil waters of righteousness. Redemption is near...

Sleep in peace dear ones.

Salute to Jewish Web sites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, another in my occasional salutes to Web sites, big and small, that find creative ways to stretch the boundaries of the Jewish Internet. Kol HaKavod!

One of the powerful uses of the World Wide Web is for social action. Virtual Jerusalem has put together a large site on behalf of the 13 arrested Iranian Jews [http://www.vjnews.com/iranjews.htm]. There's a news update, background on Iranian Jewry, addresses for writing to senior politicians and clerics in Iran (including the e-mail address for President Mohammad Khatami) and an online petition. That petition has now been passed on to the World Jewish Congress to aid it in its lobbying efforts. But you can still browse the 47,984 names of people who decided to sign up.

Do you want to keep up on the latest news about Israel and the Jewish world but don't have time to surf? Try the YudelLine [http://www.shmooze.com/yudel]. Larry Yudelson describes himself as a "recovering journalist" who skims the Internet daily for the interesting and the offbeat. On the day I checked, he had linked his site to stories about how Israel's Habima National Theatre is barring English speaking immigrants because of their accents (Ha'aretz), about Richard Nixon and his alleged anti-Semitism (Newsweek), and about erotic archeological finds uncovered at Kiryat Shmonah (Jerusalem Post.)

Occasionally, Yudelson annotates the articles with his own take on world stories.

Rabbinic Reflections

All her paths lead to peace

By RABBI MOSHE SHULMAN

"Because of the trembling and fear that Jacob caused Isaac, he was punished with the tragedy of Joseph." (Zohar, 1:144)

"Because Jacob took the blessing deceitfully, his children were placed at the mercy of the children of Esau for generations." (Zohar Chadash, 23)

Commenting on the tragedy of the story of Jacob and Esau as expressed by these sources, Harav Naftali Zvi Yehuda Berlin, the Netziv, asks the obvious question: How was it that the birthright and legacy of the children of Abraham came to be fought over in this seemingly tragic manner?

In a fascinating expression of profound insight into the psychology of human behaviour the Netziv suggests that the true tragedy here was one of a total breakdown of communication between the principle players, Jacob and Esau. This is even more true with Isaac and Rebecca.

Clearly Rebecca and Isaac had different views on the respective merits of their children. Tragically, says the Netziv, instead of confronting each other with their personal perspectives, they never talked to each other. This was due, in part, to the fact that they came from two different worlds.

Open, honest communication between them was never there. In the entire portion, with the exception of half a sentence of dialogue at the end of the portion, there is no verbal communication whatsoever between the two principle players.

When applied directly to the area of family dynamics and communication between members of a household, this is certainly a critical lesson for us to learn. Clearly the most significant breakdown of marriages in this decade results from lack of proper channels of communication between spouses. And a case could be made for the veracity of this statement regarding relationships between children and parents as well.

But there is also a broader aspect of communication that must be explored in this context, and that is communication between Jews as a community. After all, we are all one family. And if we cannot find a common language with which to communicate with each other peacefully and harmoniously, then we will ultimately end up fighting with each other.

Whether debating local politics or Israeli politics, religious dogma or halachic nuances, we must be guided by the dictum of our sages (Ethics of our Fathers): "Rabbi Eliezer taught: Let the honour of your friends be dear to you, and do not be quick to anger."

Rav Joseph Soloveitchik said, in this context: "I may attack a certain point of view which I consider false, but I will never attack a person who preaches it. I have always a high regard for the individual who is honest and moral, even when I am not in agreement with him. Such a relation is in accord with the concept of kavod habriyot, for beloved is man for he is created in the image of God."

As spouses, parents, friends, neighbours, or members of a community, in every aspect of our interpersonal relationships with one another, we would do well to constantly remind ourselves of this lesson. Open communication, dialogue, civility, mutual respect, tolerance and understanding are the basic components for creating a people that "loves peace and pursues peace," and Abaye taught that peace is the essence of the entire Torah, as it says: Ve'chol netivoteha shalom – All her paths lead to peace."

American Jewish lore

Books
Bernard Baskin

American Jewish Desk Reference*, The Ultimate One-Volume Reference to the Jewish Experience in America (American Jewish Historical Society, $61.50).

This attractive, oversized volume is a splendid work for reference and enjoyable browsing – a treasure house of absorbing and useful information. Almost all subjects are covered – history, religion, rituals, law, politics, business, music and the arts, sports, entertainment, language and science. Facts and statistics alternate with telling anecdotes and unusual kernels of American Jewish lore.

In addition to the well-written, in-depth essays on significant topics, there are brief but adequate biographies of more than 500 prominent or influential Jewish personalities. Did you know these celebrities were Jewish – J.D. Salinger, Ayn Rand, Dorothy Parker, Erica Jong, Al Capp, Harold Ross, Judy Holliday, Leslie Howard, Mike Nichols, Carl Reiner, Gilda Radner, Edward G. Robinson, Roseanne, Gene Wilder, Shelly Winters, Paddy Chayefsky, Carl Sagan, Robert Capa, Jim Dine, Judy Chicago?

The following are some unrelated, but typical entries that caught my attention:

• "Coca-Cola became kosher in 1935. Rabbi Geffen of Atlanta approached the company and asked if he could have access to the highly secret formula for the drink – perhaps one of the best-kept secrets in the country.

"After swearing him to absolute secrecy, the company provided him with a list of ingredients. They were not all kosher. Working with the rabbi, the company substituted other products which were, and now even the most observant Jews can feel comfortable that 'things go better with coke.'"

Actor Leonard Nimoy, best known as Mr. Spock, the pointy-eared half human/half alien in Star Trek, writes: "When I was a boy, there was a particular blessing used in our local shul. The four fingers of each hand were split to create the Hebrew letter shin, representing … the name of Almighty.

"When we were creating the television program Star Trek, we needed a salute. I thought back to that hand symbol and proposed it. The rest, as they say, is history."

• "The preparation and sale of kosher food in the United States is now a major industry, with total sales estimated at $3.25 billion and total consumers at 7.5 million. There are over 41,000 commercial products certified to be kosher and over 8,400 companies producing these products.

• "The 1934 election for governor of New York pitted two Jews against each other – Herbert Lehman, the candidate of the Democratic party, was the incumbent and his Republican opponent was the now-legendary Robert Moses.

"Lehman won in a landslide. It should be noted that all his life Moses tried to distance himself from his Jewish heritage (his mother was Jewish), once threatening to sue the editors of the Jewish Encyclopedia for libel when he learned that they were planning to include his biography."

• "As the Titanic sank on the night of April 14, 1912, 21-year-old David Sarnoff was at his wireless telegraph listening post in New York for 72 uninterrupted hours, relaying to newspapers and frantic family members news of the sinking. This action made his career – and assured the future of radio communication.

"Wireless communications had, up to that time, been regarded as a novelty. Sarnoff's career took off with the new medium, and he rose to become chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America (RCA).

• Unlike other chassidic sects in the United States, which maintained insular communities, the Lubavitch movement was committed to expanding its membership and bringing all Jews into its circle. Rabbi Menachem Schneerson established Lubavitch centres, Chabad houses, and modern technological innovations such as toll-free numbers, satellite hookups, mikvah-tanks, and sukkah-mobiles.

"Rabbi Schneerson also differed from many of his fellow Chassidim in his strong support for the State of Israel and his desire to influence internal Israeli politics… He vehemently opposed the Camp David accords and also sought to change Israel's Law of Return so that conversions performed by non-Orthodox rabbis would be invalidated."

We would like to express our deepest gratitude to our families and friends for your support, heartfelt sympathies and generous donations during our time of bereavement for the untimely loss of our beloved

Professors raise questions about community's future

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Four York University professors who recently participated in a lively panel discussion about the Jewish future raised many questions but provided few answers about the shape of the Jewish community in 50 or 100 years.

Jewish studies professor Sara Horowitz, who both moderated and participated in the discussion at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), called Jews of today "Jews of choice.

"Jews today are not forced to be Jews. That…is the basis of the Jewish future," she said.

The panel discussion highlighted many of the same issues raised three years ago at conference on the Jewish future, which was sponsored by philanthropist Bernard Ghert and held at York University.

Among those who organized the earlier conference were Prof. Michael Brown, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies; Prof. Bernard Lightman, co-ordinator of the science, technology, culture and society program; and Prof. Rachel Schlesinger, associate professor of sociology. They were also the panelists at the recent discussion, along with Horowitz.

A book based on the conference – Creating the Jewish Future (AltaMira 1999), co-edited by Brown and Lightman – was referred to by the panel.

Horowitz said one of the main issues facing Diaspora Jewry is that they feel extremely comfortable. "Diaspora Jews find our welcome so welcoming that we'll be welcomed out of existence."

She said a serious challenge for continuity is that Jews are no longer a community of immigrants. "We feel part of the North American culture…We feel connected to Canada. There's no need to feel [that one] belongs to a Jewish group."

In trying to project what the community will look like, Schlesinger said, it is important to look back and compare today's community with that of 50 years ago. There have been changes in the roles of women and men within the family structure, she said.

The strength of the Jewish community today is that it can accommodate the changes and it welcomes the diversity, Schlesinger said.

She noted that a big difference between communities then and now is that in the past, there was "generational continuity in the way rituals were passed down."

With the increased mobility of families, generational continuity is more difficult, and people have to be more innovative with rituals, she said. "Instead of always going back to the old ways, they are finding new, creative ways."

Stressing that decisions need to be made on how community resources are allocated, Brown asked:

'Diaspora Jews find our welcome so welcoming that we'll be welcomed out of existence'

"Should the community do outreach to people who have drifted away and bring them back to the community or should the money be spent where the affiliation is strong?"

The cost of being part of the Jewish community – for day school, camp and synagogue fees – is "alienating people," he said.

"We want to be open, accessible and be reaching out, and give attention to people, or else it becomes too difficult to be Jewish."

Studies show that the more intense Jewish education is, the more "likely it is to stick," because Jews need to know the content of Judaism, he said. In addition, camps and youth groups offer opportunities to feel Jewish and "put book knowledge to work."

Lightman raised the issue of how much of a role religion will play in the future. "Although belief in God is no longer necessary to be a Jew, I wonder if we can withstand the forces of secularization. Will we resist the forces of secularization to retain religion?"

The panel discussion was presented by The Downtown Learning Council with the First Narayever Congregation and Jewish Campus Services.

A house located at 42 St. George St., originally owned by Mendel Granatstein, is the first house on record in Toronto to be owned by a Jew. It is slated for demolition to make way for a University of Toronto building.

Historical home faces demolition

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Sheldon Godfrey learned recently that the University of Toronto is set to demolish a house at 42 St. George St., he flew into action.

Godfrey, a former chair of the Heritage Canada Foundation, and the author of several books on Canadian Jewish history, immediately wrote Heritage Toronto and asked that the building be designated a heritage site under the Ontario Heritage Act.

The building, he said in a recent interview, was the residence of Mendel Granatstein, and is the first house in Toronto that was owned by a Jew, according to Heritage Toronto records. "There were Jewish people in the community 100 years earlier, but no records were kept."

Granatstein, said Godfrey, immigrated to Canada from Poland around 1900, and owned a business that employed many other Jewish immigrants. He received a permit in December 1919 to build the $13,000 house, located just north of College Street.

"It was a huge amount at that time. It was a grand house," said Godfrey.

According to Godfrey, after Heritage Toronto received his letter, a meeting was arranged for Oct. 14 to discuss the issue, but he was not informed until after the fact, he said. "They decided, without my being there, not to have the house designated."

Richard Stromberg, manager of historical preservation at Heritage Toronto, acknowledged that Granatstein's house is the oldest house called to their attention, that was owned by a Jew. However, he said, "Architecturally, though, the house does not stand out from other houses of that period.

"There were a lot of houses built in the Georgian Revival style, and this house is of that type.

"We are still trying to discover Granatstein's social significance. If information does come forward, then it is possible that the board will reverse its decision."

If the decision is reversed, then the matter will be brought before the Toronto City Council, which has the ultimate say, said Stromberg."We are the advisory council."

He said, however, that the Ontario Heritage Act can only delay the demolition of a building; it cannot prevent it. "If council designates the building as a heritage site, then the demolition permit would be nullified. Even then, though, the demolition is delayed, not prevented."

On Oct. 22, U of T received a permit to demolish the building in order to make space for the university's planned information technology building, said Godfrey. "I spoke to representatives from U of T, and they said that they would see if somehow, Granatstein's home can be incorporated into the new building.

"It rests in the hands of university authorities to make the right decision. People who think that it is important to incorporate Granatstein's home into the new building should be allowed a chance to speak.

"A statement needs to be made that Jewish heritage is also a part of the city's heritage. Jewish settlers were among the earliest settlers in the area, and that should be reflected in the area's heritage," Godfrey said.

New head of Emunah Women to be honoured on Nov. 21

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judith Pachino may have retired from teaching, but, as she puts it, she definitely hasn't retired from life.

In fact, this past spring, she accepted the position of national president of Emunah Women of Canada, Canadian arm of World Emunah, one of the world's largest women's religious Zionist organizations.

However, that is not to say that that is the only way she spends her time. She and her husband Marvin, former headmaster of CHAT, often visit their son in Israel, their three daughters in New Jersey, their 20 grandchildren, and their parents, who all live in Baltimore.

She is a family life educator for Jewish Family & Child Service, and is active in Bnai Torah Congregation. She is also a board member of Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women.

In her free time, she reads, does crossword puzzles, and is a popular public speaker.

"The wonderful thing about retirement," she told The CJN in an interview, "is that you can be busy with so many different things."

She said she became involved in Emunah, joining the Shoshana Etzion chapter in Montreal, "the first time we lived in a place where there was a women's religious Zionist organization."

When the family moved to Toronto, she joined Ilana chapter, and became very active in Emunah's Toronto Council, especially in public speaking, education and culture.

Judith Pachino

The motto of Emunah, she said, reflects her personal ideology: The land of Israel, for the people of Israel, in accordance with the Torah of Israel. That being said, she is proud, she said, that all Jews are accepted into all projects of Emunah, which include day cares, nurseries, high schools, and two children's villages, Neve Michael, in Pardess Chana, and Beit Elazraki in Netanya.

Toronto Emunah's dinner, which will be held on Nov. 21 at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, will be in aid of Emunah's newest project, The Crisis Centre for Children at Risk. The guest speaker will be noted writer Yaffa Eliach.

The crisis centre, located in the Neve Michael Children's Village, will serve children at risk in their homes who must be removed from their families on an emergency basis because of child abuse – physical or emotional – and/or neglect.

The centre will be open and staffed 24 hours a day and children will remain there for at least three months. Pachino explained that "if at that time, the staff feel that a child is ready for the next level, he or she will be able to integrate into Neve Michael."

The ultimate goal is to heal the emotional and physical scars, so that they are able to be productive functioning people in society, said Pachino.

The centre has been built at the request of the Israel department of welfare. "While there are a few other crisis centres, this is the only one able to take children from traditional lifestyles as well as others."

Emunah of Canada has undertaken the responsibility of providing salaries, inside and playground equipment, and furnishings. "Basically we provide everything but the shell," Pachino said, noting that the structure has been provided.

While it is a major undertaking, "we pride ourselves that we have honoured every commitment we have ever made," she noted.

The hope is that the crisis centre will begin to accept children in December, she said.

During her three year term as national president, she said she hopes to "forge a greater sense of being part of a whole organization" in the chapters, through personal visits, a national newsletter, and "by giving members the opportunity to meet and come to know each other."

While most of the membership is in Montreal and Toronto, Pachino said that there are chapters in Ottawa, Hamilton, Windsor, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver, as well as a dormant one in the Maritimes that she hopes to be able to revitalize.

For more information about Emunah, or about the dinner, call 416-636-0036.

H.O.T.'s Handy-Work

They may not be professional do-it-yourselfers but members of UJA Federation's Hands On Toronto (H.O.T.) community service project recently put their tools to the test at the Just A Second Shop.

A crew of five HOTSTART volunteers, equipped with hammers and saws, recently lent their helpful hands and skills to the used clothing store to make room for more stock. Operated by Jewish Family and Child Service, Just A Second has been providing used clothing, appliances, toys and books to needy community members free of charge or at drastically reduced prices since 1982.

The shop, located at 4117 Bathurst Street, was in desperate need of minor improvements to accommodate a steady increase in donations. "We had no place to put our books and some of our clothes," explains store manager Klara Ifrah.

The HOTSTART team, directed by Lisa Dolovich and Adam Tizel, built and installed a bookshelf, re-located rods, cut and refinished a table and removed an obtrusive bar from the back of the store. The skillful squad will return to Just A Second in a few weeks to install additional racks.

"I've never met such a considerate and committed group of young people," said Ifrah. "They really paid attention to our needs and tried so hard to please us."

"It feels good to know we're making a real difference," says Dolovich, whose HOTSTART team has also helped JF&CS clients pack belongings, paint and make small repairs to an apartment.

Other H.O.T. community service projects include programs for JF&CS's Bigs and Littles, Kehilla low cost residential housing, nursing homes, Bloorview Hospital and the Bathurst Jewish Centre's Children's Discovery Museum.

For more information about H.O.T., call Elana Carr at (416) 631-5736.

Leaders Give Landmark Lessons

Three of Canada's leading real estate entrepreneurs recently gave a compelling crash course on one of the world's most risky and rewarding businesses.

Ed Sonshine, President and CEO of RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust, Peter Cohen, President and CEO of Centrefund Realty Corporation and Mitchell Goldhar, President and CEO of First Professional Management Inc., were the panel of property experts at a recent event sponsored by UJA Federation's Real Estate Cabinet.

(Clockwise) Peter Cohen, event chair David Peltz, Ed Sonshine, Mitchell Goldhar

The trio of trendsetters spoke to an audience of more than 400 people revealing, with riveting detail, their harrowing rise to the top of the commercial real estate sector.

Cohen, Sonshine and Goldhar, told participants how they survived and eventually realized advantages from the devastating collapse of the Canadian commercial real estate market during the late '80s and early '90s by riding the wave of mega-shopping centre developments that has swept across the country.

"We survived because we were disciplined and remained focused on value added property and basic necessity retail," said Cohen, who recounted the long-lasting impact of his first major deal, the purchase of Department Store Holdings. "The assets I acquired in that first deal helped me weather the storm of the real estate depression in the early '90s."

Goldhar, who is responsible for bringing the U.S. giant, Wal-Mart, into Canada, credited luck and timing for a venture that has led to the building of nearly 50 Wal-Mart outlets across the country. "I'd say it was approximately 5% skill and 95% luck," Goldhar modestly claimed. "I happened to be at the right place at the right time." Luck aside, Goldhar said survival in the retail sector has to do with paying close attention to social and demographic changes.

Sonshine's secret for success in surviving disaster and owning Canada's largest publicly traded Real Estate Investment Trust, is based on three guiding principles: restricting debt to no more than 50% of equity, focusing on the least volatile sector of real estate, and maintaining diverse, high quality tenants. For Sonshine, it seems to be a winning formula. Today, RioCan owns one third of all new format retail space built in Canada in the last five years. Not bad for someone who says, "all I wanted in high school was a job that paid $10,000."

Societies Stalwart Supporters

Tzedakah is more than a charitable instinct for the men and women of UJA Federation's Societies Division. It's a way of life.

Contributions to UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 by the members of Toronto's active mutual benefit societies are up by 5% over last year. More than 2,000 societies members contribute close to $400,000 to the UJA Federation Campaign and various other UJA Federation funded projects in Israel each year. "I am very proud of how well our members have managed to keep pace with our growing campaign," notes Mike Rosenberg, who co-chairs the Societies Division with Ralph Snow.

"It's in our blood," explains Yetta Sternberg, President of the Stashiver Society's Women's Auxiliary, which has been raising funds for UJA Federation since the late '50s.

Every year, teas and other events held by Societies and several ladies' auxiliaries raise thousands of dollars for communal projects in Israel, such as a community centre in Kfar Gvirol and a therapeutic riding camp near Eilat.

Abe Zukerman has been a member of the Wierzbinker Friendly Mutual Benefit Society since he arrived in Toronto from Poland in 1958. After losing his entire family during World War II, Zukerman's vow to become involved in any cause that would revive the Jewish nation made him a staunch supporter of UJA Federation. "I still have the official records from the '60s of the annual UJA Federation campaign our Society organized," Zukerman recalls.

"Israel has always been important among societies' members because many are Holocaust survivors," explains Snow. "Their support of UJA Federation gives them the opportunity to make sure Israel thrives as the home of our people."

"No other cause touches so many lives," adds Philip Platt, a member of the Keltzer Society, one of Toronto's oldest. "It's our obligation to assist UJA Federation in its important work."

Palestinian Jews' war efforts were often hindered

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Palestinian Jews desperately tried to help European Jews during the Holocaust, but their attempts were thwarted by England's and America's unwillingness to join the fight, according to Prof. Michael Bar-Zohar.

Holocaust Education Week

Bar-Zohar, author, lecturer and official biographer of David Ben-Gurion, spoke at the Borochov Cultural Centre, as part of Holocaust Education Week.

The period from 1939 to 1942 was, Bar-Zohar said, a time of ignorance. "Jews in Palestine, as in the world at large, did not know what would happen in Europe."

But as awareness of the atrocities grew, leaders in Palestine went into action. In the early '40s, Ben-Gurion, later the first prime minister of Israel and head of the Jewish Agency, came to the United States and tried to warn people of the impending danger in Europe.

But many young Americans were apathetic toward the war, Bar-Zohar said. "The reaction was extremely mild or indifferent," he added in a later interview.

Ben-Gurion knew that after the war, many countries would feel guilty about what had happened and would therefore be more inclined to support the idea of a Jewish state, Bar-Zohar said.

In June 1942, at a conference in New York of the Congress of the American Zionists, Ben-Gurion announced his goal of creating a Jewish homeland after the war.

"This was the first time the goal of a Jewish state became the official goal of the Zionist movement," Bar-Zohar said.

Previously, Zionists had been reluctant to mention the words "Jewish state" for fear of upsetting the British, he said.

In addition to announcing the planned homeland, Ben-Gurion, his aids and a rescue board devised initiatives to help the European Jews, including a major rescue to bring large numbers of Jews, especially children, out of Europe; a minor rescue to bring individuals and families out of Europe; a move to send Jewish emissaries to Nazi-occupied territory to get information; and a request to Palestinian Jews to help fight the Germans.

"In a very short time, more than 20,000 people volunteered for the British army," Bar Zohar said, referring to the success of the last initiative.

By November 1942, the world knew of the atrocities taking place in Europe. Sixty-nine Jewish Palestinians who had been detained in Poland after visiting relatives were exchanged for Germans. After their release, the Jews described the massacres taking place in Poland.

In response, Ben-Gurion established a secret group of young aids based in Istanbul, Turkey, to create contacts with officers, diplomats and anyone else who could provide information that would help save the Jews in Europe.

The Nazis infiltrated this organization, followed its actions, and often knew of its rescue plans before they were carried out, Bar-Zohar said.

Rescues were also limited by the British government's refusal to allow the Jews to be transported to England, Bar-Zohar said. "They didn't want thousands of Jews from Europe…They systematically killed any initiative to rescue anyone."

The only initiative they didn't kill turned out to be a false initiative, Bar-Zohar said. In the spring of 1943, England agreed that 5,000 Jewish children could be sent from Bulgaria to Palestine. Although Bulgaria had agreed to this, it never intended to follow through, because the Nazis had told the government not to.

In the end, virtually all the efforts of the Palestinian Jews to help the European Jews were in vain without the help of the Allies.

"There was not any will on their side to do anything," Bar-Zohar said. "The British were too busy with their relationship with the Arabs…They thought they had more important things to do than save the Jews."

JVS helps launch youth centre

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Since September, 324 youths have found jobs using a centre operated by Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto.

The career centre, Youthinc., offers job search advice, provides office equipment and displays job postings.

When Human Resources Development Canada (HRDC) decided to create the youth centre, it approached JVS, the Toronto District School Board and the YMCA for help.

HRDC now funds the centre, and JVS runs it in partnership with the school board and the YMCA.

While the centre's official launch was Oct. 29, it was open over the summer for the Hire A Student program, a government initiative to help youths find work.

Tony Stephens, 26, immigrated to Canada from England in August and has used the centre frequently.

The centre is different from any he visited in England, he said.

"It's a very relaxed environment. However, the staff are very professional and the facilities are really state of the art," he said.

Youthinc.'s facilities include 19 computers connected to the Internet, a printer, photocopier, fax machine and phones.

It has meeting rooms which can be used for activities like group study sessions or student council meetings.

It also has a mini theatre for companies wanting to conduct staff training at the centre or give employment workshops.

JVS has two full-time and two part-time staff working in the centre.

Youthinc. is located in the North York City Centre on Yonge Street, and is free for students and non-students between the ages of 14 to 29.

Media and Jews part of CJC region plenary

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — How do the general media (TV, radio and newspapers) treat news about Jews, Jewish issues and Israel?

This lively subject will be discussed by five well-known Jewish journalists at a town-hall meeting Nov. 27 to which the public is invited.

The town-hall meeting is the opening night showcase of the 30th triennial plenary congress of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region.

The five journalists will speak on, From Tablet to Internet, at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre, 7026 Bathurst St., just north of Steeles Avenue.

"We're looking forward to a very interesting exchange among the panelists and some provocative questions from the audience on this current issue," said Bernie Farber, executive director, CJC, Ontario region.

The blue-ribbon panel consists of CBC anchor Hana Gartner as moderator, Joe Schlesinger, CBC Senior Correspondent, Susan Cole, associate editor, NOW magazine, Evan Solomon, author and broadcaster, and Ezra Levant, editorial writer and columnist for the National Post.

Reports from Moshe Ronen, national CJC president, and Keith Landy, Ontario region chair, will precede the panel.

Four plenums planned

The two-day plenary will continue Sunday, Nov. 28, all day at the Lipa Green Centre with four plenums, each lasting about 90 minutes, beginning at 8.30 a.m., open to members of Congress.

The first plenum will be, Zionism: Time to Redefine Our Dream, with Professor Shevach Weiss, former speaker of the Knesset, as the main participant.

Plenums will follow on When to Speak Out, When to Remain Silent; Emerging Issues in Elder Care; and Small Communities...Am I My Brother's Keeper?

A highlight of the Sunday meeting will be the chair's luncheon at which Landy will report on Congress' stewardship of affairs of nearly 200,000 Jewish Ontarions.

A message from Premier Mike Harris will be delivered at this luncheon.

The evening will conclude with a dessert reception and entertainment by a klezmer band, Beyond The Pale.

El Al, a plenary partner, is supplying two free tickets to Israel, for which a draw will be held. The winner must be in attendance.

Admission is $5 with advance tickets only . Tickets are available at the CJC office, 635-2883, and at Israel's, The Judaica Centre.

DANNY SHIMONI, Optimistic Attitude

On the fourth day of the war in Lebanon, 22 year old Danny Shimoni's tank was hit twice by Syrian anti-tank missiles ...

"It is very difficult today to describe the pain" says Danny. "My legs were crushed and the heat from the explosion was an unbearable 3000C". Danny chose to fight and did not allow himself to lose consciousness. "I was always a happy person and I love life. I felt very close to death, and I thought about my mother — I had to make sure that I stay alive."

Danny lost both his legs and needed numerous operations. He was unable to work due to his terrible injuries, and became very restless.

At an event in Tel Aviv he met Ehud Barak, who was then Deputy Chief of Staff and Danny's commander in the past. Danny expressed an interest in returning to the army. Barak found him a position working with the Emergency Crew in the offices of the Commander of Education, where he stayed for six years.

Today, with the help of Beit Halochem, Danny says his injuries seem almost natural. "Although," he adds, "an injury is something that stays with you for the rest of your life. I think about it when I get dressed in the morning, when I get tired and at home when I take off my prosthesis."

Danny studied accounting and married his girlfriend Ronit. They have two children who were born to a reality of a father in a wheelchair. Although his memories are difficult, he remains the optimist that he always was.

APPROACHING THE MILLENNIUM: VIEWS AND VEXATIONS

The final two lectures in this series feature outstanding and internationally renowned figures who will reflect on the relationship of Jews and Judaism to the millennium.

"The Year 2000. Is it too Late for the Messiah to Come?"
Rabbi Irving Greenberg
President, Chaverim Kol Yisrael/ Jewish Life Network
Tuesday, November 23, at 8 p.m.
Rabbi Irving Greenberg will explain the relationship between Judaism and Messianism, focusing on: when our history is replete with false Messianism, failed Messianism and broken Messianism, what credibility does Messianism still hold for modern Jews?

"Why Wariness is Warranted: Irksome Roles Assigned to 'the Jews' in Millennialist Scenarios"
Professor Michael Cook
Judeo-Christian Studies, Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati
Tuesday, November 30, at 8 p.m.
Many end-time thinkers, seeing Jews and Israel as central to history's culmination, associate 'Tribulation', 'Rapture', '666', 'Anti-Christ' and 'Armageddon' with the Jewish people. Some identify the Jews as God's primary concern in history and the sole means by which to gauge the world's timetable; others see the Jews as embodying the 'evil' to be decimated if Jesus' millennial rule is to begin.

Destruction of European Jews was known by Allies by 1942

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Information about the destruction of European Jewry was abundant, widespread and internationally disseminated as early as 1942, asserts Michael Marrus, dean of graduate studies and professor of history at the University of Toronto.

Marrus, a noted scholar and author in the field of Holocaust studies, was speaking at Holy Blossom Temple as part of Holocaust Education Week, co-ordinated by the UJA Federation Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre Holocaust Education Week committee.

Holocaust Education Week

In fact, he said, a declaration in the name of 11 national Allied governments and dated Dec. 17, 1942, referred to "this bestial policy of extermination."

There was an article in the New York Times in January 1944, radio messages intercepted by British Intelligence from 1939 to 1942 when it broke the German codes, and reports by journalists of massive deportations in broad daylight from the Netherlands, Belgium and France in 1942.

The Babi Yar massacre in 1941 was reported by journalists in the foreign media, Marrus said.

A report from the Jewish Bund broadcast on the BBC in May 1942 said that from the beginning of June 1941, Germany had embarked on the physical extermination of the Jews on Polish soil, and that between June 1941 and April 1942, an estimated 700,000 Polish Jews had been killed. The broadcast also predicted, Marrus said, that "in the last five minutes of the war, they will kill all the Jews of Europe."

Hitler's plans were not a secret in occupied Europe, either, Marrus pointed out, talking about the hundreds of civilians involved peripherally in the situation, such as railroad conductors, civic administrators, clerks.

The chief prosecutor at the Nuremberg trials of the infamous Einsatzgruppen said there were 100 copies of their reports sent to various officials in many different offices. "How secret could it have been?" Marrus asked.

Nevertheless, he said, there is "a big difference between information and awareness," full realization of what is going on.

"To use modern terms," Marrus said, "they just didn't get it."

For one thing, he said, people couldn't believe it, not from ill will or insensitivity, but because it was simply not rational. Then too, people remembered talk during World War I of German atrocities that turned out to be pure propaganda. "How can you tell the difference?" Marrus asked.

Not only could people not believe it, he said; they couldn't even imagine it. One of the few who could, Winston Churchill, in 1944 called it the worst crime in the history of the world. "He was a historian – he had historical imagination."

Another consideration, said Marrus was politics. "It was not always in the political interest or vision of some of the receiving world to imagine it," he said dryly. For instance, "if Britain conceded [what was going on], it might promote the idea of a Jewish state in Palestine."

In Poland, there was a fear on the part of the underground and its London representatives that the Polish population as a whole would not be recognized as a victim of Hitler's policies.

"They were afraid that even if the Germans were thrown out, the Soviets would come in. That, of course, is exactly what happened," Marrus said.

Marrus described another problem as "bureaucratic smothering."

For instance, he said, a telegram arrived in Britain from a representative of the World Jewish Congress in Geneva, speaking of the massive attempt to exterminate the Jews of Europe.

"The telegram came to the appropriate office, it was put in a file, and the file was circulated from desk to desk while different parts of it were checked and confirmed. Over time, the file got bigger and bigger. People went on leave, or got sick. Someone spilled coffee on the file."

What we see as electrifying, Marrus said, was seen then as one of hundreds of documents.

Marrus pointed out that for the Americans, the Japanese were seen as demonic. The predisposition was just not there to think the Nazis were capable of doing such terrible things, he said. "Allied soldiers encountered the German Luftwaffe or the army in North Africa fighting a relatively civil war campaign."

Don't forget, Marrus concluded, even European Jews lacked awareness of what was going on. A letter from a French Jew deported in 1944 said he "believed that he would be fine, that he was going to a work camp. Instead he went to Auschwitz."

During the question period, Marrus noted that many people during the war years felt that the best way to help the Jews was to concentrate on winning the war and defeat Hitler, rather than to specifically target concentration camps or rail lines.

Remember too, Marrus asked: "How much of the massacres happening now, such as Cambodian peasants, do we get?" Even though to some extent the Holocaust has sensitized us, and even though there is better media coverage of events, "even then we don't necessarily get it."

New Web site aims to make student life easier

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Noah Gurza and his partner Reza Zargham, 24-year-old McGill University graduates, have created a Web site to make student life easier.

The site, campusaccess.com, which is geared to university, college and high school students, offers information on everything from how to survive a relationship to applying for graduate school.

The site is divided into seven sections: education, student life, internships, career, travel, health and resources.

The education section contains links to Canadian and American universities, colleges and career centres, and it provides information about graduate schools and financial aid.

Its student-life section gives advice on getting along with other students. It also has tips on renting an apartment, buying a car, getting a credit card, buying groceries and drinking.

The academic life section contains tips on coping with stress and note-taking. It also has quick and easy food recipes.

The travel section consists of city guides; the health section offers sex, fitness and fashion information and the reference section contains directories and news and weather information.

The site also has a classified section where users can view or post ads for apartment rentals, auto sales, employment and book sales.

Most pages contain a few paragraphs written in informal language followed by related links. Much of the content seems like it was written by a well-informed older sibling or friend giving advice.

Gurza and Zargham's experiences made them realize the need for an information site geared towards Canadian students and graduates.

Zargham, who has a bachelor of commerce degree, remembers one particularly gruelling aspect of student life – being recruited on campus by potential employers.

"I found it to be the epitome of a rat race. You just kind of get overwhelmed by the whole situation," he said.

Gurza, a political science grad, was not part of any formal on-campus recruitment, but many of his friends were, he said."They did not know what industry to turn to and how to go about it."

To fill this need, the site's career section contains tips for interviews and resume writing. It even allows users to ask career experts questions.

Users can also e-mail the site's health experts with questions about nutrition, fitness and motivation.

Gurza and Zargham formed the site in partnership with Kevin Makra, author of The Canada Student Employment Guide and so there is free access to this guide on the site.

While Zargham found on-campus recruitment intimidating, it was planning life after graduation which frightened Gurza.

Two years ago, while still a student, Gurza began thinking about life after undergrad. "So many options were running through my head," he said.

So he visited the campus career centre – his first and last trip. "It was a short visit," Gurza said with a laugh. "I left thinking I hadn't gained anything from it."

He said the information at the centre was very basic."I left there very disenchanted. I was maybe expecting too much."

Later, in the spring of 1998, when he began researching and applying to graduate schools, Gurza again noticed a disparity in resources.

"I was a little lost in terms of where I was going to go in terms of the direction of my life. I saw there was no comprehensive resource to help me decide," he said.

His friends, who were also finishing undergraduate programs, were asking similar questions and many were interested in paying off loans and finding jobs rather than going back to school, he noted.

But there was no one-stop resource for them to turn to.

So, Gurza decided to create one.

He said he initially thought of creating CD-ROMs, but realized the Internet was more versatile because it could be updated regularly and was more interactive.

He began to do research by gathering information about campus and post-campus life.

He spoke to experts on financial aid, graduate schools, and other student-related areas. He also sent questionnaires to every Canadian college and university.

In March of this year, Gurza launched a skeleton of today's site – a 100-page question and answer-based site filled with advice for post-secondary students.

In June, Zargham, approached Gurza with the idea of teaming up. They agreed that Zargham would mainly handle the business side of the site – budgeting and finance – while Gurza would primarily handle the content of the site.

On Sept. 1, after a year-and-a-half of planning, the pair officially launched campusaccess.com.

"Since Sept. 1, we've had about a 500 percent increase in our traffic," said Zargham.

The pair are happy with the site's success, but they were reluctant to reveal any plans for future expansion.

"Right now, we're very information-based. We want to start offering services," Zargham said.

"We've got some projects on the go we think will become very valuable to students."

Caplan brings own immigrant roots to job

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Elinor Caplan had barely been installed as Canada's immigration minister, when the first big test of her mettle came: the unexpected arrival of nearly 600 Chinese migrants crammed aboard four rusting hulks, spirited to Canada by shady people-smugglers.

As thousands of Canadians clamored for the arrivals to be denied entry – calls that were bolstered by the Reform party – Caplan attended Shemini Atzeret services at the Markham Lubavitch congregation, and heard a sermon that helped make her decision easier.

The sermon was about a man walking down a path and arriving at a fork. A sign post pointing the way had fallen down, so the man picked it up and put it back, with the sign pointing to where he had come from. The man then knew which way to proceed.

So which way to go depends on where one has been.

Thus, for Caplan, what to do with the Chinese boat people was a no-brainer in light of Canada's dismal record in admitting Jewish refugees before and during World War II.

"Everyone is entitled under Canadian law to have their case heard," Caplan, 55, told The CJN in an interview prior to a Canadian Society for Yad Vashem dinner this past Monday night, which honoured her as Woman of the Year. "And I would never do anything that would endanger lives."

Besides, "In our [Jewish] tradition, we know the adage that if you save one life, you've saved the entire world."

Caplan isn't out to save the world, but as Canada's newest (and first Jewish) immigration minister – a prickly post at the best of times – it's her job to set goals for the number of newcomers Ottawa will admit, and then, it is hoped, live up to those goals with a mix of policy and compassion.

She comes to the job after having paid dues at the municipal and provincial levels. After serving on the now-defunct city council of North York as comptroller and councillor, she waded into provincial politics, and from 1985 to 1997, was the MPP for Oriole riding. She also served as Ontario's minister of health in David Peterson's government.

In 1997, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien tapped her to become the Liberal hopeful in the federal riding of Thornhill, and she won the heavily Jewish seat handily.

Last August – almost a century after her own grandparents journeyed from Poland to Canada – Caplan, holding a Tanach she was given by Shaarei Shomayim Congregation after she graduated from teacher's college, was sworn into the federal cabinet.

It's been a heady few months for the minister, who recently conceded that Canada has not lived up to its immigration quotas, and would do its best to meet targets for 2000.

At a Nov. 1 briefing, Caplan revealed that her department will fall 10 to 20 percent behind targets laid out last year. Ottawa had expected to take in between 200,000 and 225,000 newcomers in 1999, but projections show the figure will be closer to 180,000.

In 1998, the immigration department also fell well short of its target for that year.

Caplan reiterated her goal of between 200,000 and 225,000 newcomers for next year, encompassing 200,000 immigrants and some 25,000 refugees.

"With our birthrate, an aging workforce and an increasingly global marketplace, immigration is essential to maintaining Canada's place as a leader in the economy of the 21st century," she said.

Elinor Caplan

But her goals are still a far cry from the Liberals' 1993 Red Book of promises, which pledged that immigration levels would be set at one percent of the population, or roughly 300,000 people a year.

Caplan blames budget cuts.

"When the Liberal government took over, there was a $43 billion annual deficit, and the decision was made that we had to get our fiscal house in order. All ministries had reductions. The result has been this ministry has had challenges in the areas of client service and being able to process applications, simply because of the desire by the government to get its house in order."

Caplan said she will continue to pursue a target of 300,000 newcomers a year.

Her plan for 2000 calls for between 42,000 and 45,000 immigrants in the family class (in addition to about 15,000 parents and grandparents), while economic immigrants will account for between 117,000 and 130,000 people.

Caplan tried to reassure Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, which recently expressed concern over a government blueprint that would set more stringent requirements for proficiency in English or French.

Language requirements, she explained, are not imposed on refugees or in the family reunification category. Good knowledge of English or French has always been a requirement in the independent immigrant class, she said.

Caplan also said her department is committed to retain the Immigration and Refugee Board, which has come under much criticism in recent years, and will even seek to cut the determination period for refugee claimants, from the current average of 11 month, to six months.

The former Elinor Hershorn (with various spellings among her relatives) recalls that both sets of her grandparents came here in the early part of this century from the same place in Poland: a community called Slipia, which the Nazis wiped off the map.

Being a descendant of immigrants "is a sensitivity I share with most Canadians, with the exception of some of our aboriginal people. In Canada, someone on your family tree is an immigrant or refugee, and it's only a question of seniority."

CJC calls for full funding in wake of UN ruling

On the same day as the UN decision was released, Ontario Education Minister Janet Ecker's office issued a terse statement, saying Queen's Park "remain[s] committed to the existing publicly funded education system. The Ontario government will continue to uphold its constitutional obligations and fund public and separate schools fully.

"The Ontario government is committed to providing an excellent public education system that is open to all students regardless of religious or cultural backgrounds," the statement said.

That certitude flew in the face of assurances that Ontario had little choice but to obey the UN.

Waldman's lawyer, York University professor Anne Bayefsky, told a news conference last Friday she "fully expects" that Ontario's laws will be changed to reflect the UN's finding.

There could two remedies, Bayefsky said: either withdrawing public funds for Catholic schools, or extending tax dollars for private and independent schools. She said the latter is more realistic.

Although the UN decision is not binding, and there is no way to enforce it, it is binding "in the sense that Canada is a leader in international law," and if it ignores the decision, "we cannot then presume to lecture countries like China and Indonesia on human rights," she said.

Canada, Bayefsky noted, is a signatory to several human rights agreements, including the one the UN said it is contravening, and ignoring the UN would diminish Canada's moral authority on the world stage. Ontario "cannot choose not to comply."

The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress praised the UN decision, stating that it "clearly puts the fight for fair funding in a new arena. In order for Canada not to be named a human rights violator, our country must remedy the situation quickly."

Congress Ontario chair Keith Landy called on the province "to immediately and in earnest begin the process of providing access to government funding for all independent, religious schools."

Waldman said he, and members of other religions, "demand" that authorities comply with the UN decision.

He also said he expects "full compensation for the monies I spent to educate my children since launching my complaint, and I expect it no later than Feb. 3, 2000."

Waldman said he favours extending funding to Jewish day schools, and not taking away money from the Catholic system.

"You don't build a better society by taking away, but by adding to it."

He said only two percent of students in Ontario attend private or independent schools, so the cost of funding them would be two percent of Ontario's annual $14 billion education budget, or $280 million a year – "a drop in the bucket."

Bayefsky, who argued Waldman's case before the 18-member UN committee, said that over the past 25 years, there have been 89 complaints lodged against Canada at the world body.

In eight of those, Canada was found to have violated its international obligations, and in two of those cases, domestic laws were amended.

Aviva Weiss, speaking on behalf of Ontario Parents for Equality in Education Funding, said the UN decision was "a wake-up call" for Canada.

Wayne Levin, a director of Parents for Educational Choice, a grassroots group dedicated to fair funding in education, said he had high hopes that the UN finding would shame Ontario into changing its laws.

But by ignoring the decision, Ontario's behaviour "is Orwellian," said Levin, who has two children in a Jewish day school. "It's saying that some students are more equal than others."

Judaica exhibit on display in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A display of Judaica used by the military during World War II recently opened at the National Library of Canada.

The opening included a tribute to the late Elliott Gluck, a veteran of World War II and a longtime member of the council of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection at the National Library. There was also a presentation of a new book by Ottawa Jewish veterans about their experiences during World War II.

Cheryl Jaffee, curator of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection, told those assembled: "I drew inspiration for this display from Elliott's passion for bringing his wartime experiences to life."

The display consists of such things as calendars noting Jewish holidays, small Bibles designed to be carried by soldiers in their breast pockets, pamphlets with special prayers for divine intercession and even instructions in Jewish burial and mourning practice.

"We know that the lives of people and books are intertwined," and the books in the display tell the story of the Jewish soldiers' lives during World War II, Jaffee said.

Wartime experiences

There was a ceremonial presentation of two copies of the new book by the Jewish veterans for legal deposit in the National Library.

The book, There I Was...A Collection of Reminiscences by Members of the Ottawa Jewish Community Who Served in WWII, contains 53 accounts of the wartime experiences of Jewish veterans from the Ottawa area.

It was produced jointly by the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society and the Ottawa Post of the Jewish War Veterans. Cy Torontow, a veteran, co-ordinated the project.

"The book epitomizes what Elliott Gluck really meant to the Ottawa community," said Mel Goldberg, who represented the Ottawa Post of the Jewish War Veterans. "It epitomizes the spirit, the indomitable attitude that our boys had and which comes forth in Elliott Gluck's writing."

The Judaica display runs until Nov. 19.

By G.K. SIMCOE

While waiting in the government lobby to buttonhole a particular politician last week, a friendly MP came over to chat for a few minutes. Knowing my religious orientation, he offered that it had been quite a good week for "your people."

When pressed for details, he began to list the Jewish "scores" – the Bob Rabinovitch appointment to CBC, the apparent break on the 10 percent ownership clause offered to Gerry Schwartz at Onex by Transport Minister David Collenette, and the successful visit to the Hill by Israeli Minister of Justice Yossi Beilin.

Later on, the absurdity of what had been said began to settle in and thoughts turned to how Jews are viewed on the Hill.

Is the Jewish dimension highlighted in a way that is different from that of Italians or Filipinos?

When profiling Bob Rabinovitch, for example, did the oft-repeated insertion about his having belonged to a "mostly Jewish" fraternity advance the story in a meaningful way?

What does Gerry Schwartz' commitment to Israel have to do with his bid to merge Air Canada and Canadian Airlines? For Maclean's, apparently, enough to make several references to it in their feature article about the man.

Perhaps one can argue that journalists looking to add some colour to a story will reach for these kind of tidbits. But what about the political sector? Should Jews be concerned that a little tally rests in the heads of many about how many Jews are in senior government positions?

Consider it for a moment. There's Eddie Goldenberg and Chaviva Hosek at the Prime Minister's Office, the previously mentioned Bob Rabinovitch at CBC, Charles Freedman, the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada and so on.

In reality, their being Jewish likely had nothing to do with their achievements. Nor, except in the broadest context of personal social values, is it likely that their religious affiliation influences their contribution to public policy or government business.

As great as the strides forward may have been since Jews were barred from recreational beaches (along with dogs) and admission to McGill's College of Pharmacy, sometimes it is hard to escape the belief that for some – even in the political sector – one's religion is not a significant detail...unless the religion is Judaism.

"They were very nice, very social people," said Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman of Toronto's Jewish Russian Community Centre. "They helped a lot of people."

The Kogans would often come to services at the Rockford Road synagogue for emigres from the former Soviet Union, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

Relatives of the Kogans cannot sit shivah until some remains are found and returned to the family, the rabbi noted. He said that if remains are discovered at the crash site, they will be buried in a funeral service.

If there are no remains, a memorial ceremony may take place, and the family may erect a plaque or marker of some kind, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

Mark Kogan had two sisters, both in Toronto, while Anna had a brother in Russia.

Elena Kogan said there would be a trust established in her parents' name, the proceeds from which will pay the tuition for one year for a Russian immigrant to study at the University of Toronto's engineering faculty.

Community campus dedicated in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two years to the day after the announcement of plans for a Montreal Jewish Community Campus that would transform Cummings House and the YM-YWHA, the project was officially dedicated in the presence of Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, Premier Lucien Bouchard and Montreal Mayor Pierre Bourque.

The campus is still "a work in progress," said outgoing FEDERATION CJA president Stanley Plotnick, who was hailed as a visionary for conceptualizing the project, the biggest the Jewish community has undertaken in over 30 years, and as a man of uncommon determination for seeing it through to near-completion.

Plotnick was unfazed by the inevitable delays: "We are taught that God created the world from nothing in six days. That was relatively easy. He didn't have renovations."

Even though the finishing touches continue, the 1,000 people who attended the event in the new Gelber Conference Centre built behind Cummings House were awed by what they saw. The community now has an elegant, state-of-the art facility for meetings and dinners, which can be subdivided into six smaller rooms. It is scheduled to be open for use in February.

The main entrance lobby, at 1 Carré Cummings Square (formerly 5151 Côte Ste. Catherine Rd.), has been completely done over in a warm beige brick, reminiscent of Jerusalem stone. It is now an airy atrium overlooked by a mezzanine. The Jewish Public Library and Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre are off either side.

Work continues on a new fifth floor and renovations throughout Cummings House are expected to be completed next month.

The campus project has grown from an initial $23-million target to the now projected $30 million. About $12 million is being spent on the north side of the campus and $18 million on the Y to the south.

At the Y, the first phase of construction, a two-level underground parking lot for 260 cars, has been completed. Work has begun on a new education centre, a gymnasium and a swimming pool, that should be finished by late next spring.

Politics were set aside as the leaders of the three levels of government, which contributed equally a total of $3.9 million to the project, took turns praising the community for its belief in its future in Quebec.

Bouchard even joked that his "former colleague in the House of Commons" (Gray) said more in 10 minutes than he did in three years.

The premier said the project is not just a fund-raising success. "It is above all a mark of significant solidarity and co-operation that augur well for the future of your community. It provides an example for others and proves that, despite the difficulties with which a community may be faced, despite the skepticism that it sometimes combats, even within the community itself, it is still worth making the effort to dream, to hope and to work."

Bouchard talked about Jewish history in Quebec, and paid tribute to the foresight of eastern European Jewish immigrants in the early part of this century for their establishment of a network of social, cultural and educational institutions "that were in the avant-garde of what existed here.

"It is not an exaggeration to say, in 1999, that this new building will be a perpetual tribute to all those who built your institutions and permitted your community to know a true success 'à la québécoise.'"

Bouchard acknowledged that being Jewish in Quebec is not always easy. "Your community has sometimes faced certain expressions of intolerance here. In these difficult periods, some visionaries undertook the essential work of maintaining solid ties with your community."

Even in the '30s, prominent Quebecers like Henri Bourassa sought dialogue with Jewish leaders such as H.M. Caiserman. Years later, René Lévesque was among those who continued the dialogue with David Rome and others, he said.

Bouchard urged that these historic ties be deepened today. "Your contribution is essential to Quebec. We need it. That is why your project has interested us from the start.

"The campus... represents for all Quebecers an open door to the Montreal Jewish community and its cultural, social and human richness. It symbolizes for us the common home that we wish to share with all Jews of Quebec."

Gray also set the inauguration of the campus within the community's long tradition of contribution to the country. The project, he said, is a sign of the community's "future health and vitality."

Bourque used the occasion to announce that the city will give a $100,000 grant to the Holocaust Centre, which is to be expanded and updated. He deemed the campus "fabulous, fabulous."

"I believe today the Montreal Jewish community stands a bit more proudly, is more secure, more understood, more recognized, more appreciated and more encouraged about its future," Plotnick said in his farewell address.

Funding for the project has come mainly from individuals in the Jewish community, as well as foundations and corporations. Plotnick reiterated that not a single dollar came from Combined Jewish Appeal funds designated for local services.

Pipe bombs injure dozens in Netanya

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Terror struck inside Israel the day before Israeli and Palestinian officials were to begin final-status negotiations.

Israeli officials said they would fight terrorism and continue to work towards peace with the Palestinian Authority despite a triple bombing in the northern coastal town of Netanya.

No group claimed responsibility for the three pipe bombs that exploded Sunday, wounding dozens of people. A fourth pipe bomb did not detonate.

Israeli and Palestinian officials blamed the attack on Islamic militants seeking to derail the peace process.

The Israeli cabinet was meeting to approve the next withdrawal from the West Bank when the attack occurred.

According to witnesses and police, the explosions occurred at about 10:30 a.m in the heart of Netanya's business district.

Witnesses and police said the bombs had been planted near a garbage bin at a corner near a bank.

"I was at the corner, waiting at a red light, when I heard an explosion behind us – three explosions," said an Israel Radio reporter who was at the scene.

"There was heavy smoke and fire. I looked behind and saw fire in a pile of garbage, and I saw six or seven people lying on the sidewalk. Police arrived in a few minutes."

"Suddenly I heard this explosion," said another witness. "I turned around. I was burned in the hand. My father was thrown back by the force of the blast. Everyone was running around. People were lying in the streets. It was chaos."

Police cordoned off the area as ambulance crews began evacuating the wounded to three area hospitals.

Israeli police put up roadblocks around Netanya, as part of a search for suspects. A local police official confirmed that suspects had been detained for questioning based on descriptions given by witnesses.

An Israel Radio reporter said police were investigating whether the same terrorist cell that planted two pipe bombs outside the Netanya police station three months ago – an incident that caused no damage or injuries – was involved in Sunday's bombing.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak issued a statement soon after the explosions, saying the government was determined to eliminate terrorism and that it expected the Palestinian Authority to do likewise.

The Palestinian Authority also spoke out against the attack.

Tayeb Abdel Rahim, secretary of the Palestinian Authority, said there was a clear link between the attack and Monday's scheduled start of the final-status talks.

He said the Palestinian Authority had in recent weeks arrested some 25 Islamic Jihad activists and members of the Hamas military wing who were allegedly planning terrorist attacks.

The bombing followed last week's summit in Oslo, where Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat vowed to press ahead with the final stretch of the peace process.

Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh said Sunday that Israeli officials have long been warning that Islamic militants may try to sabotage the process.

The militants "do not want us to move forward," Sneh told Israel Radio. But, he added, "the dialogue will continue."

Communications Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said that despite Sunday's attack, he believes Israel should go ahead with the next West Bank withdrawal.

Under the terms of the September land-for-peace agreement that Israel signed in Egypt, Israel is slated to transfer an additional five percent of the West Bank to the Palestinians on Nov. 15.

"I see no reason to stop this process," Ben-Eliezer told Israel Radio.

In the wake of the attack, Israeli police were put on heightened alert throughout the country.

Police Commissioner Yehuda Wilk said police had received no specific information of a planned attack in Netanya.

He dismissed a possible link between the nail-packed pipe-bombs in Netanya and a Hamas leaflet distributed over the weekend threatening attacks against Israel.

"This is not the same [kind of attack] as the leaflet discussed. This was a pipe bomb with improvised explosives. That doesn't say there won't be attempts to carry out more serious attacks," he said.

Hamas leader Sheik Ahmed Yassin was quoted as telling Qatar television he could neither confirm nor deny the authenticity of the leaflet because he was not in contact with the organization's military wing.

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinians officially began final-status talks when the two sides met in Ramallah Monday.

The discussions opened with speeches by the heads of the negotiating teams, Oded Eran and Yasser Abed Rabbo, followed by debate regarding which topics will be included in the framework agreement, and the method of discussion.

In his opening comments, Eran stressed the historical importance of negotiating, and the heavy weight of responsibility resting on the shoulders of both sides.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak has set out a number of guidelines for the Israeli delegation:

- The framework agreement will signal the end of the conflict between the two sides.
- The accord will bring about a separation of political policy and security between Israel and "the Palestinian entity."
- The "five red lines" must be kept: No return to 1967 borders; a united Jerusalem as Israel's capital; no foreign army west of the Jordan valley; no return of refugees to Israeli territory; and most of the settlements to be absorbed by Israel.

The talks lasted for two hours. The delegations were scheduled to meet in Ramallah again Wednesday.

Next week the negotiations will be held in Israel.

Number of homeless youth in Jerusalem growing

Although in Israel, where the official languages are Hebrew and Arabic, most of this crowd is speaking English.

This is, after all, what the Jerusalem Report magazine termed the "headquarters of teenage American Jerusalem."

While the teens – many dressed all in black, others wearing American brand name clothing – look like they're just hanging out, a good number of them call this open square "home."

There are about 400 homeless youth in Jerusalem – a growing population in this city – according to the many organizations that help street kids. More than 200 of them are English-speaking Americans and Canadians.

Adam used to be one of them. Now, he only comes here occasionally to see some of his friends. "I will always be attracted to Zion Square because I'm American," says Adam.

Israeli-born Dan is a fixture at the square. Although not all of the kids in this group are homeless, 17-year-old Dan is.

Sitting on some steps in an alley just off Zion Square, Dan has warily agreed to be interviewed. After the first story about Zion Square's teens appeared in a local newspaper, police "started beating up the kids to clear the [promenade]," Dan says.

Dan, dressed in baggy khakis and a buttoned down shirt, has been living on and off the streets since he was 15, when his abusive father broke his nose.

Dan's family, who immigrated from the States, lives in the settlements. He sometimes goes to his parents' home, but inevitably ends up back on the streets. His family is religious, he's secular.

Raquel's life revolves around kids like Dan and Adam – dropouts, drug addicts, and just plain homeless youth. She refers to them as "my kids."

The kids are teenage children of American and Canadians either living here or in North America.

Their stories are variations on several key themes: broken homes; parents who have become religious, while they stayed secular; being uprooted from North America and then incomplete absorption; and sexual molestation by a relative.

Some have been in jail, mostly for drugs and theft. Many are, or have been, homeless.

No one seems interested in them, except for the police – who monitor drug use and who off and on pull kids in – and Raquel and her institute.

Raquel takes these kids to court and finds them lawyers, she takes them for AIDS tests, she talks them out of suicide, she drags junkies to drug-rehabilitation centres, and most of all, she listens – as an adult they can trust.

Recounting his past two years on the streets, Dan says he can't remember how many times he's been frisked and arrested by the police. "I didn't know it was a crime to sleep on stairs," he says innocently.

According to the municipality's youth services director, Shabtai Amedi, there are approximately 130 homeless youth in Jerusalem.

Raquel says the city's figures are off. "The city says we only have eight kids who are homeless," Raquel says. "Correction: We only have eight kids that fit into the city's program."

The city's program only accepts homeless youth between the ages of 18 and 22. The person must be totally drug-free, and must have citizenship.

Raquel, whose father is a former Venezuelan career diplomat and that nation's poet laureate, has a network of people willing to shelter the homeless English-speaking kids for a night or two, here and there. Some are families she has worked with in the past, others are people who just want to help.

When Adam was under house arrest, he says he let more than 30 homeless kids each spend some time under his roof. Adam says it was the least he could do. After all, the apartment which served as his base for house arrest was paid for by a lawyer who volunteers his services to The Rose Institute.

Raquel's institute, which last October was officially recognized as a not-for-profit organization, is made up of three social workers in addition to a band of volunteers – ranging from lawyers offering free services, to restaurants giving away food, to therapists waiving their fees.

"She does things no one else will do," Adam says. "The first time I felt I had self worth was after six months house arrest."

Sixty percent of Raquel's "kids" are here on tourist visas and are not even officially recognized by the State.

This group of young people is comprised of those who were sent to Israel by their parents to participate in various programs, but because they haven't fit in, have found themselves without lodging.

There are also those who came as tourists and don't want to return to their home countries, for many different reasons, including abusive homes, religious coercion and drug addictions. As non-citizens they are not entitled to any government assistance.

The other 40 percent of "her" kids are citizens whose families moved here and who haven't adjusted to the way of life here, or have fallen in with the wrong crowds, or do not fit in, religiously, in their families,

Six of her kids – who range in age from 14 to 22 – have died this year, be it from a "stabbing, suicide … one reason or another."

"I didn't know so many [of these] kids existed," admits one of the Rose Institute's social workers, Caryn Green, a Wurzweiler School of Social Work graduate who works with about 100 kids. "I was surprised."

Raquel, who got her master's degree in social work at Yeshiva University and worked in crisis intervention in the U.S. before moving here almost five years ago, says awareness of this issue by the general population is one of the first steps in overcoming the problem.

"Everyone acknowledges it's a surprise to them – the number of these kids – because people haven't been exposed to the information and didn't know what kind of crisis it could cause."

"The underground community [of homeless youth] is exploding," she says.

Raquel is hoping to receive funding from the Jerusalem municipality in the near future. At the moment, she relies solely on funding from North America.

But the city – which allocates $23,000 Cdn towards helping its homeless young adults and its shelters – has no budget for Raquel's kids.

Adam is hoping to change this situation.

With Raquel's help, he managed to secure a spot in the municipality's homeless program – despite his tourist status.

He is hoping to prove to the government that The Rose Institute should receive funding for the work it does with the troubled and homeless English-speaking youth.

"My goal is to get citizenship, get a job, and go [back to school]," says Adam.

In the meantime, however, Adam rents a city-subsidized apartment and is completing community service at an old age home for his drug conviction. His parents and five siblings still live in the States.

The institute doesn't only help the kids on the street, but it helps get them off the street, too. Raquel offers educational and rehabilitation programs to help reduce the numbers of kids who take to the streets.

Raquel tries to keep families together and sends some of her kids back to North America.

"We try to build a bond so that when the kids go back they will go to therapy," she says.

And she also works with the families here. "We start working as a unit – trying to keep the kid in a family setting."

Adam admits that he didn't think he would be in contact with his family again. But now, he says he speaks to them as much as he can.

He adds that he wants to go into social work and would like to work for the institute.

"In the dictionary under social worker, there should be a picture of Raquel," he says. Then, after catching her eye, he smiles broadly.

Assad's son hopeful of peace

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — While the son of Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, speaking in Paris, was upbeat about breaking the deadlock in talks with Israel, Syrian state-run media is skeptical about progress, accusing Israel and the United States of derailing the peace process.

On a ground-breaking visit to France, Bashar Assad expressed hope that the four-year impasse in negotiations with Israel would be broken soon. After meeting with French President Jacques Chirac for two hours, he said that he hopes negotiations with Israel will be renewed, but added that "it all depends on the good intentions of all sides involved."

Amid speculation in the French media about the purpose of his visit, Syria's heir apparent, 36, said that Europe's role in the Middle East peace process is "always important but complementary to that of the United States."

France and Syria have similar, but not identical positions on the peace process, he said.

Syrian media steps up criticism of Israel, U.S.

It was not known whether Bashar Assad was scheduled to return to Syria, or stay in Paris when Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat were to be in the city.

In a radio interview in Jerusalem, Barak praised Syrian President Hafez Assad, and said he hoped that talks between Israel and Syria would be revived by the end of the year.

Meanwhile, Syria's state-run media stepped up attacks against Israel and the United States, and called for enhanced French involvement in the peace process. Tashrin newspaper announced recently that the chances of renewed negotiations with Israel have lessened due to "Israel's obstinacy, the categorical rejection of international decisions by Tel Aviv leaders, and the boundless support given to them by the Americans."

Tashrin contended that damage to the peace process has been caused both by "Israel's conquest ambitions for the Golan Heights, the West Bank and Jerusalem," and by "Israel's refusal to resume talks with Syria from the point at which they were halted in 1996."

Coupled with this anti-Israel attack, Tashrin charged that "harm to the peace process derives from the lack of an active and just American role. The experience of the past two years proves that Washington is too weak to use its authority to impose a balance between the sides and implement Security Council resolutions."

The Tashrin article emphasized that "there is now an imperative for a European role in moving the peace process forward."

The Syrian paper elaborated: "Within Europe, France plays an important role, one which is positive and necessary... France is a member of the [Grapes of Wrath] monitoring committee, and is a balancing factor on this committee, denouncing the aggressor, and disclosing (Israel's) responsibility for all to see."

A conference marking the centennial of the birth of the Iranian Islamic revolution leader, Ayatollah Khomeini, concluded recently in Damascus. Figures associated with the Teheran leadership, such as Hezbollah secretary general Hasan Nasrallah, and Islamic Jihad secretary general Ramadan Shalah, took part in the meetings.

Commentators in Damascus interpreted the conference as a Syrian signal indicating pessimism over recent developments in the peace process and over Israel's positions regarding the renewal of talks.

This is the fourth event held in Damascus in the past month involving participants from Palestinian and Lebanese organizations that oppose the peace process.

Oscar-nominated film imitates director's life

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Drawing on her childhood in Switzerland and letting her memory run free, prominent Quebec filmmaker Lea Pool has written and directed an affecting coming-of-age movie which critics in Canada and the United States have universally acclaimed.

Premiered at the recent Toronto International Film Festival, Emporte-moi (Set Me Free) is Pool's sixth feature since 1979, a tender, warm-hearted film which is partly autobiographical. Last week, it was named Canada's entry for best foreign-language film at the 2000 Academy Awards in Los Angeles.

In Emporte-moi, set in Montreal and environs in 1963, the protagonist is Hanna, a 13-year-old girl. (Not by coincidence, Pool has an adopted child whose name is Giula Hanna). Pool's father, an unpublished poet and a Holocaust survivor, is Jewish. Her mother, a garment factory worker, is Catholic.

They have a problematic marriage, and amid the household discord, Hanna struggles with her adolescence and her dreams.

When the characters in Emporte-moi are compared with Pool's actual biography, one is struck by the notion that art can indeed imitate life.

Pool's dad, Jacob David Mohr, was a Polish Jew born in the village of Rozwadov. In 1939, the year Germany invaded Poland, he was living in Capri, Italy. He was married to a woman whose German-Jewish father was a banker.

During the war, they fled to southern France, where his wife was arrested and ultimately deported to a concentration camp. Alone, Mohr made his way southward toward Spain. In a move which probably saved him, he flew to Switzerland. There he remained in a camp until 1945.

Only then did he learn that his parents had been murdered in Rozwadov, and that his sister and two children had been killed in Auschwitz.

At the end of the war, Mohr met Pool's mother, a Protestant whose surname was Pool. She and her brother, who is three years older, were born in Geneva. They were raised in Geneva and Lausanne in a French milieu.

Lea Pool

As in Emporte-moi, Pool was subjected to anti-Semitic taunts when she was a student. "I was accused of killing Jesus," she said in an interview." I answered that Jesus was a Jew."

Her father was a frustrated writer. "The problem was that he spoke nine languages – Polish, Yiddish, German, Russian, Italian, Hebrew, French, Spanish and English – but could not write one correctly. So he was never published and suffered a lot from this situation. He was an autodidact, never having studied at a university."

Pool enjoyed a special relationship with him, although he was not an easy man. "I loved him very much. I think I am what I am because of him."

In their house, religion and poverty grated on the family's nerves. "Religion was a source of conflict between my mother's family and my father," she acknowledged.

At her father's insistence, Pool was raised as a Jew and attended synagogue. "I was never in a church," she said. "My father was not religious, but he followed Jewish rites and holidays."

Since he was chronically unemployed, the family suffered. "We were poor. I remember my parents selling a typewriter in a pawn shop."

Due to these factors, perhaps, her parents clashed, like Hanna's parents in Emporte-moi . But later, their relationship improved. Mohr died in 1975 and was buried in Israel, a country she has visited five times and loves unabashedly. Many of her cousins live in Israel. Her mother still resides in Switzerland.

In Emporte-moi, Hanna's career as a filmmaker is launched when a sympathetic teacher gives her a movie camera. In fact, Pool's attraction to cinema was a gradual process. "I never really intended to be a filmmaker," she said.

Pool, a 49-year-old former teacher, immigrated to Canada in 1975. "I found Switzerland too narrow-minded, and I knew I had to change something in my life to be more free and to be able to do something interesting."

In Montreal, she studied communication arts at the University of Quebec. "I had a chance to make a short documentary film there, and it was well received."

Thanks to a Canada Council grant, she made Stras Cafe, her first feature, which won awards at four festivals. "It took me three more films before I considered myself a filmmaker." After Stras Cafe, Pool made La femme de l'hotel and Sauvage, among others.

Emporte-moi is not her first film with Jewish characters and situations. "The (Jewish) theme was already there in 1986 with Anne Trister. "It opens with the death of a father, who is buried in Israel."

Pool, whose films are noted for their emotional intensity and esthetic beauty, is sure that Emporte-moi is not her last film revolving around Jews. "It will come again sooner or later, because it is part of me. I always do very personal films."

Currently, she is working on her next project, entitled Taxi pour la liberte. "It's a story of three people – a German-Turkish woman, a Yemenite man and a Cuban man – trying to find their roots. They have lost their respective countries and cannot find a new one. It's about exile, loss of territory and racism."

Original Jacob film available on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Two remarkable films are being released on video: the original East German version of Jacob The Liar (Jakob der Lugner), (the release date is Nov. 16) and the tender and warmhearted A Walk On The Moon, which is now available on video.

With the recent release of the Robin Williams remake, the owners of the rights to the original 1974 version of Jacob The Liar gave it a short theatrical re-release and slated it for the video market.

The original is a much smaller production than this year's remake. It has fewer special effects and its cast is composed of relatively unknown, but excellent German actors.

Valstimil Rodsky plays the central role of Jacob, but the only actor viewers may recognize in this production is Armin Mueller-Stahl, who appears in a relatively small role.

Jacob The Liar is a well-made film about an inconspicuous resident of a Polish ghetto, who accidentally overhears a radio broadcast announcing a Russian military victory. The news quickly goes through the entire ghetto and eventually everyone believes that Jacob

It's a fine life for Oliver!'s Artful Dodger

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In less than a year, Jake Epstein has graduated from performing in school plays to portraying the Artful Dodger in Lionel Bart's Oliver at the Princess of Wales Theatre.

This is the 12-year-old's second Mirvish Production since May.

"The Artful Dodger is my favourite role in the world," Jake says. "The first time I saw the movie, I started doing imitations of Jack Wilde, who played the character. Then the auditions for Oliver came up and I was really psyched."

After the first auditions, an Artful Dodger had not been found, and the people working with producers Cameron Mackintosh and David and Ed Mirvish called some local agents.

"When I went to audition, I was taught a few things in the morning, then was sent off with a group. We were taught some dance steps and a verse of Consider Yourself. I waited about a week to find out if I got the part. I couldn't sleep. I knew I had a good chance, and it was really nerve wracking.

"I've only sung a solo once in my life in front of people, so I guess I'm going to have to find out what it's like," says Jake, a novice to the musical theatre.

"At least when we are singing at rehearsal, I know everyone. Consider Yourself and I'll Do Anything are my two biggest songs. I also do a solo verse in Be Back Soon and in the reprise of A Fine Life."

To perfect the role of Dodger, Jake had to master the Cockney dialect. "At the beginning it was overwhelming. I didn't know if I was saying it right or wrong. We've had days that we've just worked on the accent going over each line. It helped when they gave me a sheet that phonetically spells out almost every word in the script."

Jake's earlier dreams were far removed from the world of entertainment. "My sister tried out at the Claude Watson art school because she told me it was really fun, and besides, it was a missed day of school. I was more of a jock, I still am, but I've been going [to Claude Watson] since Grade 4 and now I'm in Grade 7.

"At school I take drama, visual arts, dancing and singing. Last year, I was in the school play Our Town, and our drama teacher got a call from the casting director of the professional production of Our Town at the Royal Alex. My teacher asked me to audition. I got a tiny, tiny role as a paperboy, who walks on stage for about five seconds. It was really a lot of fun."

Jake shared his paperboy role with his friend Mitchell Freed. This summer, at Freed's suggestion, the two auditioned for the PBS show Ricky's Room. Jake won a leading role and says filming the show was as much fun as going to camp.

Jake Epstein

Through this experience, the budding actor met Shari Quallenberg of Vision Talent. "The casting director of Ricky's Room [Quallenberg] was also an agent. About two weeks into the filming, she called me and said, 'Do you want to have a meeting? I want to be your agent.' After one week, I got five auditions in a row. I am extremely lucky to have Shari as my agent. She was one of just a few agents called for the casting of Oliver."

Although Jake's theatrical resume is building quickly and includes filming Real Kids, Real Adventures for Firecorp VIII Productions and a commercial for Light Pasta, he considers acting his hobby.

An A student, he says his future plans are still ahead of him. His goal is to garner a university athletic, academic or arts scholarship.

When not on stage, Jake, who speaks French, plays piano, clarinet and saxophone. He participates in tennis, all star soccer, basketball, ping-pong, baseball, hockey, rollerblading, squash, gymnastics and swimming, and has a brown belt in karate.

Jake's parents are Ian Epstein, a lawyer, and Kathy Kacer, a psychologist and children's author. His sister Gabi, 14, is a member of the Toronto Children's Chorus.

His future plans include continuing to audition for parts after Oliver ends and to follow in his sister's footsteps.

"I'll probably go to Earl Haig Collegiate, cause that's where my sister goes. Wherever Gabi goes, I seem to follow her. We get along pretty well."

For more information or tickets to Oliver call TicketKing at 416-872-1212 or 1-800-461-3333.

Original Jacob better than new one has a radio and that his news is genuine.

The initial news item was true, but Jacob invents and embellishes the story after that. Although spirits in the ghetto rise because of Jacob's "news," in the end nothing really changes.

Several scenes in the original production were reproduced in the remake, but the scenes from the original appear to be shorter and more to the point. The humor is also a little more low key and the production is a little grittier and less surreal in the new version.

At the same time, I must admit that I still enjoyed the new film. Despite some negative reviews, I found this film to be both sensitive and realistic, except for the very last scene which almost destroyed the film's credibility.

I certainly think that the Williams production is much better than Life Is Beautiful. But the 1974 version of Jacob The Liar, is better than both.

Jacob The Liar was nominated in 1977 for an Academy Award for best foreign film and was recently chosen as one of the 100 most important German films of all time.

If you cannot find a copy of Jacob The Liar at your local video store, ask the manager or owner to order it through his distributor. The video is available through Morningstar Entertainment Inc. and should be accessible to every video retailer interested in stocking it.

A Walk On The Moon, released in theatres earlier this year, is a much lighter and warmhearted film.

Set in the summer of 1969, at the time of Woodstock, and when the first man landed on the moon, A Walk On The Moon could be about any working-class family. But first-time director, Tony Goldwyn, grandson of movie mogul Samuel Goldwyn, chose to make this a film about a Jewish family who spends summer vacations at a cottage in the Catskills.

A scene from Jacob the Liar.

The whole family is at the cottage except for the father, Marty Kantrowitz (Liev Schreiber). He spends all week in the city working in a television repair shop and joins his family only on weekends.

The family includes Marty's wife Pearl (Diane Lane), his teenage daughter Alison (Anna Paquin), his young son Daniel (Bobby Boriello) and his mother Lilian (Tovah Feldshuh).

The film revolves around Pearl and her feelings that life has passed her by and that her youth has disappeared before she had a chance to enjoy it.

Marty was Pearl's first boyfriend. She met him when she was 17 and she immediately became pregnant. As a result, she married Marty at a young age and accepted the responsibilities and obligations of family life at that time.

Pearl's searching for some meaning to her life leads her to an affair with the "Blouse Man" (Viggo Mortensen) who visits the cottage community on a regular basis, and to her experimenting with pot, sex and Woodstock.

Pearl must decide whether she wishes the uninhibited lifestyle of her lover or the stability and security of her family.

Lane gives one of her best performances to date as the somewhat confused and questioning Pearl Kantrowitz and Feldshuh is outstanding as the rock upon which the Kantrowitz family is anchored. Feldshuh provides the wisdom and the love the family needs to get through this crisis, and her continual stream of Yiddishisms gives the film the ethnic base for its setting.

Although A Walk On The Moon did not receive wide theatrical success, it should do much better on video. It is a film that will appeal to a lot of people on different levels. It explores the changing mores and morals of a time that has come to symbolize change, and it does so with a nice light touch that is both entertaining and thought provoking.

This video should also be readily available at video stores everywhere. It was released by Alliance Home Video and most stores will probably have at least one copy on their shelves.

Beth Tzedec cantor releases CD

CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A copy of the new CD, Creations in Rhythm: New Sounds in World Music, by Cantor Paul Kowarsky, was sent to Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak with prayers for the renewal of the peace process in the Middle East.

A thank you letter from the Prime Minister's Office states, "May the words of this prayer come to fruition."

The CD included a dedication of the song Sim Shalom in Barak's honour.

Kowarsky says he hopes his rendition of Sim Shalom will become the theme of the peace process.

"Peace and well-being, surely the dream of all mankind," are found in his rendition of Sim Shalom.

"Jew and Arab, religious and secular, Sephardi and Ashkenazi – bring us all together, we pray, so that the Middle East may become a haven of peace for all who dwell there."

On his recently released CD, tenor Kowarsky demonstrates his skill in harmonizing, his concert artistry, and his varying styles of chazzanut.

The diversity of his original music recorded on Creations in Rhythm reflects Jewish traditional sounds in music from around the world – klezmer, Ashkenazi, Sephardi, South American, and African.

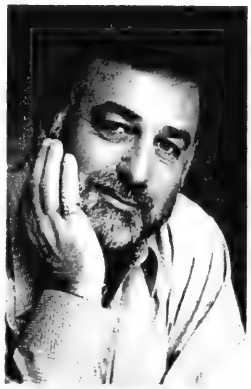
The variations of rhythms and orchestral arrangements transform liturgical music into universal world music and Kowarsky is pleased that the CD is attracting both Jewish and non Jewish fans.

There are variations of ethnic and cultural sounds and many freilech foot-tapping songs. His extensive repertoire includes chassidic, Israeli, Yiddish, opera, and popular English, Italian and Neapolitan songs.

Kowarsky, cantor of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation since 1980, is widely recognized as one of today's most outstanding cantors.

Born and raised in South Africa, Kowarsky practised law for a short time before accepting cantorial positions in Montreal, Cincinnati, and now at Beth Tzedec.

This winter, Kowarsky will be taking a six-month sabbatical and plans to visit Jewish communities worldwide. He has received numerous invitations to daven in many countries including Hungary, Australia and New Zealand.



Paul Kowarsky

His plan is to be in Israel over the next year "and I hope to sing Sim Shalom when I am there."

Over the years, Kowarsky has presented concerts and made cantorial appearances around the world.

Creations in Rhythm has been released by Kannekt Records, Canada. Kowarsky's compositions are orchestrated by five-time Canadian Juno award nominee, Howard Baer.

Creations in Rhythm and other Kowarsky recordings are available at Jewish book and gift shops, major music stores, and at the Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Yiddish is alive and well

BY BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judging by the tumultuous reception given On 2nd Avenue, presented by Olive Eye Productions, Yiddish is alive and well in Toronto.

A near sell-out crowd of 450, paid $100 a seat to benefit Yiddish studies at the University of Toronto when On 2nd Avenue opened recently at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Two other performances of the musical by the Yiddish Theatre of the Saidye Bronfman Centre in Montreal, were complete sell-outs.

"Yiddish is our heritage, our bond to the past and our obligation to the future," said Sandy Wise, chair of the opening night gala committee.

For 28 years, the U of T Yiddish studies program has played a vital role in keeping the language alive, without any funds from any other sources, except through contributions from its supporters, Marvin Schiff said.

Schiff is chair of the Yiddish studies committee, which is a subcommittee of the Committee for Yiddish, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Though the well-thought out choreography and the hustle-bustle of the New York-style musical were enjoyable, the most popular numbers were those of a more intimate style, for example, by Elan Kunin, the show's musical director, and Benji Gonshor doing Mir Kumen Fun Passaic and Hootsa Tsa. This pair brought an electric spark whenever they stepped on stage.

In the same vein, Aron Gonshor, Benji's father, got big laughs for his rendition of Menashe Skulnik's It Shouldn't Happen to a Dog, What Happened To Me. The audience appeared to enjoy those moments that were filled with the guttural sounds of street Yiddish.

Kunin's bit as a Shakespearean actor doing Hamlet in Yiddish, and substituting New York for Yorick at the behest of a prompter, was hilarious.

The veteran trouper, Sam Stein, got a big hand when he auditioned for a fictional synagogue in Mississauga, his act benefiting from the local reference. More of these would have been a good idea.

The Jenny Runs for Mayor sketch was a good one and the lyrics and dialogue were just as appropriate for Canada as for the United States. However, this plus was voided when a U.S. flag, instead of a Canadian one, was introduced at the finale.

The singing voices of Karen Karpman, Emilie Phaneuf, Michelle Heisler and Judy Strauber added a lot to On 2nd Avenue but the Molly Picon number with Heisler went on too long.

The biggest ovation opening night came when Yiddish Theatre founder Dora Wasserman was wheeled onto the stage in front of the cast by daughter, Bryna Wasserman, the theatre's present director. To make the evening complete, Bryna's son, Ian Wasserman-Turetsky, was one of the children in the cast.

DVI offers dental services to Israeli kids

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The old adage that it is better to give than to receive could be the motto of Dental Volunteers for Israel (DVI).

Two Toronto dentists, Dr. Melvin Charendoff and Dr. Irving Petroff, along with thousands of other dentists from 12 countries, have given their time and expertise to serve as volunteer dentists at DVI, a Jerusalem dental clinic that provides free services to Israeli children who would otherwise not have access to dental care.

Charendoff and Petroff told The CJN they feel great joy in knowing that they have contributed to the health of Jewish, Christian and Muslim children in Israel, many of whom have never had dental care before.

The dentists pay their own way to Israel, where they work in the clinic for periods of one to four weeks. They get free apartments for their families and enjoy a busy schedule of trips and lectures. They also receive free tickets to concerts and other events.

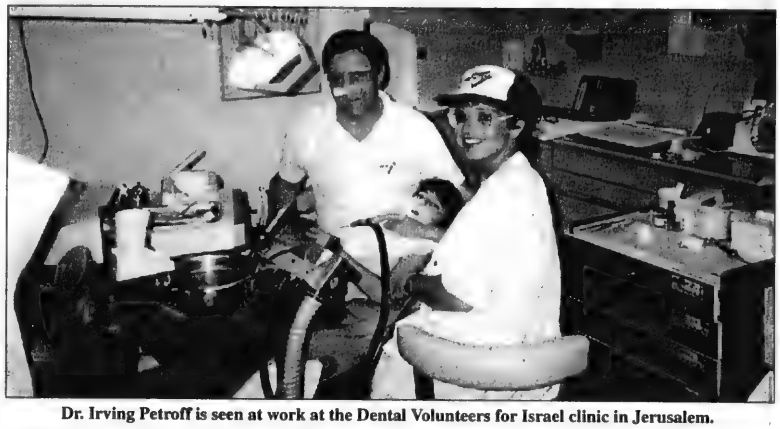
Charendoff, who has been in practice for 38 years, was last at the dental clinic in March. "The clinic is a marvelous place. It is difficult to put into words the total participation of the volunteers and the staff," he said.

Most dentists who volunteer are from Europe and not Jewish, he noted.

Trudi Birger, who founded the dental clinic and is the driving force behind its operation, was recently in Toronto. She said she hopes to attract more dentists from Canada.

Petroff, who has been in practice for 40 years, said it is wonderful to see how appreciative the Israeli patients and their families are at the DVI clinic.

"I felt tremendous as a dentist in Israel," he said, adding that he hopes to make a return visit to the clinic soon. "There is a high level of dental expertise among North American dentists, and the requirements in Israel are also very high."



Dr. Irving Petroff is seen at work at the Dental Volunteers for Israel clinic in Jerusalem.

It is wonderful to be able to transport dental skills to the children in Israel, Charendoff said. "But what we reaped in satisfaction far exceeds any professional treatment that we rendered."

He notes that Hebrew is not a prerequisite. "Our thanks were a todah [thank you] and their smiles. Many of the families brought fruit and cookies to show their appreciation."

Today, many of the patients are from Russian and Ethiopian families. "It is exciting to see black kids speaking Hebrew," Charendoff said.

The highlight of living and working in Jerusalem, he feels, is mixing with the people on the streets, taking buses and shopping, "being a temporary Israeli more than a tourist."

Both dentists made their volunteering in Israel a working holiday.

"There is plenty of time to sightsee and enjoy yourself, but at the same time, you see Israel as tourists don't," Petroff said.

Birger arranges for Israelis to escort the volunteers and they are invited for Shabbat dinners to Israeli homes and to other Israeli activities.

For more information on DVI, call Dr. Stanley Jacobson 416-413-1144 or Dr. Irving Petroff 416-445-3010.

Search for lung donor

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ten-year-old girls like to ride their bikes, play in the park with friends, and pine over the current favourite rock star.

Lisa Ostrofsky, a 10-year-old Israeli girl, lives in a small town near Safed. But she is not riding her bike or playing in the park like other girls her age.

Instead, she is in a hospital bed at Duke University Medical Centre in Durham, N.C. Her cystic fibrosis has progressed to such an advanced stage that she needs a lung transplant.

In fact, her condition has become so serious recently, that a search is under way for a lung donor who is willing and able to give Lisa part of a lung in the hope that that will help her.

A worldwide campaign has been ongoing to raise funds for Lisa to have the operation: Duke would not even accept her into the program until close to $600,000 (US) had been raised.

The family needs at least another $200,000, to pay the rest of the medical fees, the cost of potential complications, and the expenses of her father, Ilya, who is with her. Her mother and sister remain in Israel.

Cheques may be made out to Meoroth, and sent to The Lisa Fund, c/o TeleLink, 6075 Yonge St., Ste. 4000, Toronto, M2M 3W2.

For more information, call TeleLink, 416-730-9977, ext. 160, or e-mail lisa@telelinkcanada.ca

Good outlook for aging brain

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Brain cells die as we age, but the brain can then form new connections that enable us to continue to perform the same tasks we always have, said Gordon Winocour, a psychologist at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"This leads me to be pretty optimistic about the future," he told an audience at the last of the Ada Starkman lecture series.

"We've underestimated the aging brain; it's not the bleak picture we once thought."

The discovery that the elderly can reorganize their brains to use new parts, for example in remembering faces, was made using a new method of taking pictures of the brain.

Winocour showed slides indicating that young and old people use different areas of their brains to do similar tasks of memory.

The number of elderly people who suffer from cognitive impairment is only from two to six percent, he said.

Even this figure is of "epidemic proportions" and represents a tremendous loss, he said, but the majority can continue to function well throughout their lives.

Long-term memory for episodic events is lodged in a part of the brain known as the hippocampus and it is particularly susceptible to aging, as is the frontal lobe, which governs attention span, he said.

Yet, using other parts of the brain, one participant in the study was still able to classify and arrange hundreds of photographs. And another, who said he always wanted to write a play, did so.

Referring to another aspect of the brain addressed by the current research, Winocour spoke of the difficulties stroke patients experience.

Non-neurologic factors, such as an enriched environment, are crucial in all cases of cognitive impairment, Winocour said, adding that the patients who respond the best are the ones who are treated the best at home.

In animal studies, Winocour said they were able to show that rats put in an enriched environment for just a matter of days had beneficial brain changes.

"We couldn't do our work without the help of caregivers. Unfortunately, we do treat the elderly differently, even dehumanize them, and that's a real tragedy."

Conversion decision delayed

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court has delayed a hearing on the legitimacy of Conservative conversions of adopted babies, until next April.

Reform and Conservative leaders, who originally rejected a delay, accepted last week's decision with mixed feelings.

They said they are unhappy with the delay, but are pleased that Justice Aharon Barak, the president of the Supreme Court, also agreed to address the general issue of conversions in April by lumping together more than 50 other outstanding conversion cases.

That decision could set the highest level precedent on non-Orthodox conversions.

According to a statement issued by the Masorti, or Conservative movement, Barak agreed that the special panel to convene in April "will discuss the issue in principle of the State of Israel's recognition of non-Orthodox conversions."

Reform and Conservative leaders had recently turned down a request to delay the hearing made by Rabbi Michael Melchior, minister of Diaspora affairs, who is heading a new governmental conversion committee.

The committee represents the first high-level attempt to address the controversial issues that have divided the movements since Prime Minister Ehud Barak was elected in May.

The liberal movements have repeatedly sought to gain recognition for their movements and institutions in Israel. The Orthodox fear that any change in the so-called status quo, which gives the Orthodox control over Jewish religious issues, would weaken the Jewish character of Israel.

Rabbi Melchior, a modern Orthodox rabbi, said the committee's purpose is to "strengthen unity among the Jewish people in Israel and the Diaspora" and to promote "dialogue between the streams."

Although Reform and Conservative leaders are pleased with his goals to promote dialogue, they say they don't expect much from the committee, and are disappointed that they are not on the committee itself.

"I do not have high expectations from this committee," said Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Centre.

"The committee does not have the authority to decide. It will have to go back to the government, and I feel that the committee may be an unfortunate exercise in further prolonging the process."

In expressing his hopes for the committee, Rabbi Melchior has pointed to the fact that cabinet ministers across the political spectrum will address the issues there.

The liberal streams also expressed dismay that one of the committee's first acts was to ask the court to delay next week's hearings.

Oslo summit set tone for toughest talks yet

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Unlike previous Middle East summits, last week's Clinton-Barak-Arafat meeting in Oslo did not aim at achieving any dramatic breakthroughs.

Analysis

Instead, the three leaders had the more modest goal of creating a positive atmosphere as Israel and the Palestinian Authority embark on their most difficult negotiations to date – the final-status talks.

U.S. President Bill Clinton declared the meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat a success.

"We have just completed a very good meeting. I feel we have revitalized the peace process," Clinton said after the meeting, which took place amid commemorations in the Norwegian capital of the fourth anniversary of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

He offered no details about the hour-long meeting, which was intended to lay the groundwork for the final-status talks.

Those discussions – which will tackle such issues as the future of Jerusalem, Jewish settlements, Palestinian refugees and final borders – are slated to begin this week in the West Bank town of Ramallah.

Barak and Arafat have agreed to reach a final peace agreement by September 2000. They have also set an interim Feb. 15 deadline for achieving an outline of that pact.

Clinton said he would hold another summit with Barak and Arafat to work on the outline, adding that they "agreed with me that we might well have a summit at the end of this process if enough progress has been made" in the weeks before the February deadline.

Earlier in the day, the three leaders invoked Rabin's memory in a bid to kick-start the final-status talks.

Yet, for all three of the principals who assembled along with other leaders in Oslo, the summit was a high-stakes diplomatic poker game.

They knew that if they were unable to create the appropriate mood in Norway's placid setting, the task of negotiating the tough issues back home in the pressure cooker of Middle East politics would be far more difficult.

No one was underestimating the enormity of the task ahead, the consequences of failure – or the very real benefits that success will bring.

For the Israelis, a final settlement with the Palestinians will still leave unfinished business in Syria and Lebanon, but it will remove the major obstacle to normalizing relations with much of the Arab world and help secure the legitimacy that has eluded the Jewish state in the region.

For the Palestinians, a deal would mean not just a homeland, but, for the first time in history, the very real likelihood of an independent Palestinian state, with the promise of international diplomatic recognition and aid for reconstruction and development.

For Clinton, it is his best chance to redeem his presidency and associate his name in history with the achievement of a lasting peace in the Middle East. A hint of Clinton's eagerness to score this achievement could be detected at the Oslo town hall before the summit, when he joined other speakers in paying tribute to Rabin's legacy.

"If Rabin were here with us today he would say, 'There is not a moment to spare. All this honouring me and these nice words, they are very nice – but please finish the job,'" the president told those who had come to pay homage to Rabin.

"We have now a chance, but only a chance, to bring real and lasting peace between Israel and her neighbours," Clinton said. "If we let it slip away, all will bear the consequences."

Both Barak and Arafat joined in the drama played out before a cast of dignitaries that included Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin, former Israeli prime minister, Shimon Peres, Rabin's widow, Leah, as well as representatives from the European Union and senior officials from several Arab states, including Jordan and Morocco.

"I vow to you, Yitzhak, a soldier who fell in the battle for peace, that we are determined to give your death meaning by following your legacy until we achieve peace," Barak said.

"We will strive to ensure Israel's security interests and vital needs; but, at the same time, we will seek to achieve a fair settlement which reflects the needs and sensitivities of our neighbours."

Arafat gave a military salute to a large portrait of Rabin that graced the stage. But he struck a harsher, perhaps more realistic, note when he focused on issues that will dominate the final-status negotiations.

He called on Israel to return to its pre-1967 borders and declared that peace meant resisting "violence, terror, occupation, exile and settlements."

In Gaza, Palestinian officials later defended Arafat's decision to make his demands clear at the Rabin memorial ceremony.

"We are more than a year behind an agreement which should have already been completed," Palestinian official Hisham Abdel Razek told Israel Television. "Yasser Arafat must use every forum to present the needs of the Palestinian people."

Peres, speaking to Israel Radio from Oslo, came out in favour of a Palestinian state, adding that Israel needs a Palestinian state alongside the Jewish state.

Earlier in the day in Oslo, at a formal royal banquet hosted by Norway's King Harald V in Rabin's memory, Leah Rabin received a standing ovation from the 220 guests when she urged Clinton, Barak and Arafat to fulfil the dream of peace for which her husband had given his life.

"It's up to you now," she said. "Is that too much too ask?"

What is at stake in the final-status negotiations are core issues that go to the heart of a seemingly intractable dispute.

In the coming 10 months, as Israeli and Palestinian negotiators face those issues, they will know that the destinies of their peoples will be riding on the outcome of their deliberations. They will know, too, that this is a rare opportunity to strike a deal, if, indeed, a deal is politically possible for the two sides.

History will weigh heavy on their shoulders.

Chat student stars on golf links

By MICHAEL NOBLE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Multi-sport athletes, students who star in whatever team they decide to try out for, are the hallmark of the high school sports world.

Oren Eizenman is such an athlete. On October 6, the 14-year old CHAT student tied for first in the 23-team TDCAA Golf Tournament.

Eizenman's performance, less than one month into his high school career, evened him with Jeff Overholt, a Grade 12 student, and helped lead the four-man CHAT team to a second place overall finish.

Oren Eizenman

The victory was one of many highlights in Eizenman's athletic career. In addition to his golfing prowess, he is captain of the Toronto Young Nats AAA Hockey Team, and plays baseball with the province's second ranked rep squad, the Willowdale Bruins.

Hockey, however, is his passion. It was on the ice that he had his proudest moment, scoring a hat trick in front of 8,000 fans at last year's Quebec Peewee International tournament, the world's biggest of its kind. On the rink, he has competed for teams representing his school, his neighbourhood, and briefly, even played a game last year with the Israeli National Hockey team.

While he has faced opponents from as far away as Kazakhstan, his most serious competition comes, not from across the world, but across the hall. Oren is the youngest of three athletic brothers. Alon, 20, is a first team All-American who is on a hockey scholarship at Penn State, and Erez, 17, had his own feature in The CJN last year as the top scorer on the Israeli National team.

Oren, who has been on the rink since age five, has brother Alon to thank for bringing hockey to the Eizenman house,

"My parents are from Israel and never really knew the game of hockey. My older brother went up to them after seeing a game on TV and convinced them to let him play. Ever since, we've been a hockey family."

Three years ago, it was golf that started to draw the brothers' interest, and the three of them went to the driving range to see what they thought of it. Today, the youngest Eizenman is the family star on the links.

"There's no real competition in golf, because they shoot in the 90s and I'm usually in the 70s," Oren says, matter-of-factly.

Hockey is a different story, for now. "In hockey, I always try to beat them, but it usually doesn't happen. That's because I'm younger. If we were to compare when [they] were my age I'd be beating them by a lot."

Oren is getting his chance to test his skills alongside brother Erez this year on the CHAT varsity squad. The two brothers will likely get a chance to play together again when Team Israel comes calling again this winter.

Dan Shulman and Buck Martinez

Shulman turns extracurricular activity into sports career

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — During the baseball season, sports broadcaster Dan Shulman is on TSN with partner Buck Martinez calling every play, from April to October, in the Blue Jays' quest for a third World Series.

Shulman, 32, who comes from a non-athletic family never planned to make sports broadcasting a career. In fact he just looked at it as an extracurricular activity.

"I went to Western. I worked at the campus radio station and started broadcasting school basketball and football games. I looked at it as more of a hobby, but I caught the bug. I graduated as an actuary and worked for six months before deciding that I wanted to give radio a try as a career," Shulman said.

Fresh out of university, he sent out demo tapes before landing his first position – outside of Toronto.

"I landed a weekend job in Barrie with CKBB doing news and sportscasts. I ended up working there for a year and a half," he said.

The bespectacled Shulman was getting to be known on the air in Barrie when his friend named Evan Kirsh told him about an opening at CJCL, a radio station in Toronto.

"He got me an interview, but they didn't hire me. When they turned the station into an all-sports format, they needed someone, and they ended up hiring me in 1994. I started off working in the evenings and the mornings. Eventually I went to prime time with Bob McCowin," he said.

At this all-sports station, called Fan590, Shulman was faced with the biggest challenge of his young career. By going prime time, he would be heard by millions of sports fans on their drive home from work. His deep, made-for-radio voice would become known and judged by not only the audience of Toronto, but also his colleagues at the Fan.

He had one major advantage, however – the crew at the station were also young and just learning.

"It was our first couple of years at the Fan. Most of the people, including me, were in our 20s. It was a most memorable experience because we were part of the first all-sports station in Canada. It was an exciting time in Toronto. The Leafs were going far and the Blue Jays were winning World Series titles," he said.

Shulman ultimately decided to challenge himself by giving television a try. When TSN employee Jim Houston went back to his home in Vancouver, a friend suggested that Shulman apply for the vacant position – broadcasting Blue Jays baseball.

"Rod Smith, who still works at TSN, suggested that I take in a demo tape. In August [that year], I called and expressed an interest in the position. It wasn't until December that they called me and asked me to audition, which was a huge surprise," he said.

In the audition, Shulman was led into a room where he was asked to call a few innings from a previous baseball game between the Jays and the Kansas City Royals.

"I was nervous, but I felt that I had nothing to lose. After a couple of innings, I was asked to go to the offices of the big bosses," he said.

He was not offered the breakthrough television baseball broadcasting job until a couple of weeks later.

Highlights Shulman lists in his career to date include working on radio for ESPN during the playoffs last year, and his chance to record a milestone for future Hall Of Famer Roger Clemens.

"I was lucky enough to do Roger Clemens getting career strikeout number 3,000," he said.

Among the ballparks in the American League, Shulman lists Fenway, Camden Yards and Jacobs field as his favourites.

"I love the tradition of the old ballpark of Fenway. The new facilities are also nice in Baltimore and Cleveland. I will really miss Tiger stadium because the broadcast booth is so close to the action on the field," he said.

On a typical 7 p.m. game day, Shulman does a couple of hours of homework on the teams before arriving at the ball park for a 4 p.m. production meeting.

"I spend a couple of hours at home on the Internet, which has a breakdown on how the opposing team is doing."

The Inside Back

Elsie Wayne's world

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

A recent two-day conference I attended in Kingston was billed as Faith and Public Life. It brought together some 300 academics, religious and lay leaders, and policy experts to explore how faith groups in Canada can exercise more influence on public policy, and what form that influence should take.

Elected officials joined clergy, professors and other pundits in defending the role of religion in the formation of policy and in issuing a call to arms to faith groups to end their torpor and flex their muscle, in the best tradition of their stands on social justice, equality and fairness.

Alas, despite its wan efforts to reflect Canada's diverse and multi-faceted religious traditions, the conference could easily have been called Christianity and Public Life, so overwhelming was its Christian flavor and tenor. Among the panelists were two Muslims (of 350,000 in Canada); one Buddhist (of an estimated 163,000); one Sikh (of roughly 300,000 in this country) and two Jews (Rabbis Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple and Michal Shekel, education director at Temple Har Zion). The other 35 panelists, and almost all the attendees, were Christians, representing Catholics, Anglicans, several Protestant denominations and a few evangelical ones.

One delegate crystallized this unmistakable Christian slant when she rose in a plenary and demanded to know why the name of Jesus was not being hailed, and why each session did not start with a [Christian] prayer.

A good-natured Rabbi Marmur took the query because, as he jibed, he was the least qualified panelist to answer it. But his response was clear. There is a great deal of difference, he noted, between interfaith dialogue and Christian ecumenism. He did everything but say that the conference was an exercise in the latter.

But it was federal Progressive Conservative deputy leader Elsie Wayne, the feisty former mayor of Saint John, N.B., who really knocked the ball out of the park, so to speak. Employing language reminiscent of Bible-thumping U.S. Christian conservatives, Wayne defiantly charged that Canadian Christians "have not fought hard enough," and she pledged to battle "tooth and nail" to preserve "Christian values" in this country.

She wasn't done. From her conference kit, she pulled out a prayer that opened the state legislature of Kansas in 1998. Wayne said she thought the prayer was an ideal one with which to begin daily House of Commons proceedings, and, she implied, to borrow from its principles. We reprint it herewith:

"Heavenly Father, we come before you today to ask Your forgiveness and to seek Your direction and guidance. We know Your Word says, 'Woe on those who call evil good,' but that's exactly what we have done. We have lost our spiritual equilibrium and reversed our values. We confess that:

"We have ridiculed the absolute truth of Your Word and called it pluralism. We have worshiped other gods and called it multiculturalism. We have endorsed perversion and called it an alternative lifestyle. We have exploited the poor and called it the lottery. We have neglected the needy and called it self-preservation. We have rewarded laziness and called it welfare. We have killed our unborn children and called it a choice. We have shot abortionists and called it justifiable. We have neglected to discipline our children and called it building self-esteem. We have abused power and called it political savvy. We have coveted our neighbor's possessions and called it ambition. We have polluted the air with profanity and pornography and called it freedom of expression. We have ridiculed the time-honored values of our forefathers and called it enlightenment.

"Search us, O God, and know our hearts today; Cleanse us from every sin and set us free. Guide and bless these men and women who have been sent to direct us to the centre of Your will. I ask it in the name of Your Son, the living Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen."

Last month, I took a lot of heat for my description in this space of the Agudah movement. Fair enough. If I can dish it out, I should be able to take it.

Now let's see how many of us can muster our energies toward pointing out to Ms. Wayne and her ilk that perhaps not everyone appreciates the imposition of her "values" on you and me.

About Seniors

Dear JESSE,

My mother was recently in the hospital. While she was there, her doctor told me she had noticed that my mother is malnourished. I was shocked. My mother can well afford to buy groceries and the occasional meal at a restaurant. What can I do to help her?

Concerned Daughter

Dear Concerned Daughter,

Malnutrition among the elderly is a growing concern. There are many factors that contribute to poor eating habits, including how the taste of the food is perceived, financial resources, education level, health problems, and living arrangements, especially for people who live alone.

As a result, although your mother can afford to buy nutritious foods, there are probably other factors that are preventing her from eating properly.

I recommend that you and your mother make an appointment with a nutritionist and have the nutritionist assess your mother's situation and develop a meal plan.

You may also want to look into Meals on Wheels programs and the services of a home care worker who could prepare meals for your mother.

Another option would be to find a group dining program which is often available at recreational-social centres for seniors. By participating in this type of program, your mother will not only be eating nutritious food, but will also benefit from the social contact with her peers.

It is important that you address both the issue of malnourishment and the underlying cause of your mother's poor eating habits.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse represents the management and staff of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

El Al to suspend Montreal flights

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

El Al will suspend all its operations to and from Montreal as of Jan. 1, 2000, the airline announced last week.

This was the latest development in an ongoing air dispute that is threatening to strain Canada-Israel relations.

What began as a commercial conflict has escalated into a full-blown diplomatic row. Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak are scheduled to hold talks in Istanbul, Turkey, Nov. 17 and 18, at the summit of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), to try and iron out differences.

A settlement of the dispute earlier this month was described as temporary. Indeed, it lasted just 10 days before the Canadian government embarked on a hardball strategy by threatening to ban El Al flights from Canadian airspace when flying to U.S. destinations, unless Air Canada could continue its current schedule to Israel.

Barak personally intervened after his transport minister, Yitzhak Mordechai, sided with El Al, which had lobbied hard to reduce the number of Air Canada flights in the winter to four a week.

The Israeli prime minister authorized daily Air Canada flights to and from Israel to continue until Dec. 9, at which time agreements will be renegotiated.

The transport ministers of Canada and Israel are scheduled to meet in Washington Dec. 3 to seek a permanent settlement to the dispute.

El Al has adamantly opposed Air Canada's request, charging that the Canadian carrier enjoys an unfair advantage because among its ZAGREB, Croatia — Jews in Croatia are rebuilding a community traumatized and virtually destroyed during the Holocaust.

With outside assistance and encouragement, Jews have launched a modest revival as they try to overcome the bitter legacy of a pro-Nazi Croatian regime which marginalized and murdered them in a concerted anti-Semitic onslaught.

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC Opposes Bill

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress has expressed opposition to Bill S-8, which would deny entry into Canada of ships bearing possible refugee claimants. The bill, originated in the Senate and received first reading in the upper chamber on Nov. 2. The bill seeks to restore ministerial authority to prevent entry of vessels into Canada's territorial waters, or to direct vessels already in Canadian waters to the nearest port. CJC says that in light of this year's 60th anniversary of the voyage of the St. Louis, the ship carrying Jewish refugees from Hitler's Europe that was turned away by several nations, Canada should be mindful of the proposed legislation's harsh effects. The bill was proposed by Senator Ronald Ghitter, who is Jewish.

Ground Turned

VANCOUVER — Ground was broken here recently for the planned new Lubavitch centre at 41st Avenue and Oak Street. At the ceremony were Jack Diamond, honorary chair of Lubavitch British Columbia and Vancouver Mayor Philip Owen.

Every Wednesday night four Jewish volunteers travel in a van through the streets of Toronto distributing food and clothes for the homeless. The group's goal is to collect 2,500 pairs of socks before the end of December. For information, call 416-964-7698, e-mail, mail@veahavta.org.

Population Tops 6M

JERUSALEM — Israel's population is 6,169,000, according to figures released last week. The number is an increase of 154,000 over the same time a year ago. The total population growth rate is 2.5 percent. The growth rate of Muslims was highest, at 3.7 percent, followed by the Druze at 2.3 percent and Christians at 2.1 percent. The Jewish population growth rate is lowest, at 1.8 percent.

Aussies Sue Maccabi

HAIFA — Maccabi Australia is suing its parent body, the Maccabi World Union (MWU), for $300,000 in connection with the collapse of a bridge at the 1998 Maccabi Games. Four Australian athletes died in the accident, and several were injured. According to Maccabi Australia, MWU is liable for damages because it organized the Games' opening ceremony and requisitioned the construction of the bridge.

Soldiers Smuggle Drugs?

JERUSALEM — Dozens of Israeli soldiers serving in southern Lebanon smuggle drugs into Israel, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported last week. As much as three tons of heroin are smuggled into Israel across the Lebanese border each year, with soldiers making up to $10,000 for every two pounds they smuggle into the Jewish state, the paper said.

SS Guard Ordered Out

WASHINGTON — A U.S. Federal Appeals Court has upheld a 1997 deportation order against Ferdinand Hammer, 78, a retired foundry worker living in Michigan. Hammer was a Waffen-SS guard at Auschwitz and Sachsenhausen. He was ordered deported to his native Croatia. To date, 63 people have been stripped of U.S. citizenship and ordered deported since the Office of Special Investigations was set up in 1979.

Attacks on Shuls

NEW YORK — A witness prevented the recent firebombing of a Connecticut synagogue by honking his car horn. Two men outside Congregation Beth El in Norwalk were apparently frightened by the sound of the horn, dropped the Molotov cocktails they were holding and fled. There were worshippers inside the shul at the time of the incident. In August, two containers of medical waste marked with swastikas were found outside Congregation Beth El and another synagogue in Stamford, Conn.

Israel is Y2K Ready, Canada's PMO Says

OTTAWA — Israel is well prepared for the year 2000, according to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's office, which is monitoring Y2K readiness around the world.

Most of Israel's small and mid-sized companies are still installing new systems. The Prime Minister's Office (PMO) in Ottawa is considering special measures to assist these companies, especially with computer software.

The Israel Electric Company has reported that 90 percent of its equipment is Y2K compliant. Bezeq, Israel's telecommunications company, is well advanced in its preparations, the PMO says.

The major systems of the national airline, El Al, were made compliant in 1998.

Israel's central bank has stated that it expects the banking system to have fully completed its Y2K preparations by the end of October.

According to the Israeli government, central systems for the management of medical information have been made Y2K compliant.

Israel's existing Emergency Public Services (EPS) is currently conducting exercises and developing contingency plans in preparation for Y2K.

Native Canadians help restore Jewish cemetery

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two young native men are bent over desecrated tombstones at the Lambton Mills Cemetery, gently and patiently removing vicious words spray-painted by vandals prior to Halloween.

The repair work, which took place last week on six tombstones and a Holocaust memorial, was a volunteer effort initiated by Tony Duguid, 29, a Six Nations Mohawk art restorer and board member of the Native Men's Residence (NA-ME-RES) on Vaughan Road.

The residence works in partnership with Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish & Humanitarian Relief Committee. Ve'ahavta joined forces with NA-ME-RES last year to work on its Street Help project.

Help was also given at no charge by Graffiti Removal Systems, a Mississauga company.

Duguid learned of the Jewish cemetery desecration from a radio news report. "I was really disappointed that people are still doing this," he said at the cemetery, located on Royal York Road.

His offer to help was conveyed by Ve'ahavta's executive director Avrum Rosensweig to Canadian Jewish Congress and to a representative of the cemetery.

"The Jewish community, especially Ve'ahavta, has bent over backwards to help us in our time of need," said Duguid. "We can do something, as one community to another, saying we empathize...and that this is not acceptable. We want to help."

Phillip Baker, 24, an Ojibway, hadn't had any prior contact with the Jewish community, but was "glad to help out."

Desecrating a grave is one of the most drastic things you can do to a person, said Shawn Beauvais, 22, a Swampy Cree. "Since I'm a minority myself, I feel we've got to help each other," he said. "I feel

"It's still me inside"

I met my friend Alan more than 20 years ago. He was, even then, so young, a seasoned lawyer with the government of Ontario. I was barely past my call to the bar, attending a special program for lawyers who were seeking "accreditation" to represent children in court in Child Welfare Act cases.

He was one of the "accreditors." We have been friends ever since.

Alan is wise and gentle, speaking almost always with commanding authority, though barely ever above a low, soft, casual tone of voice. He is an insightful and precise thinker whose judgment is sought by colleagues and friends constantly clamoring to consult with him. His is the legal acumen that today guides one of the largest ministries in the government of Ontario. Throughout his life he has carried great responsibility. It has been his nature and his conviction never to recoil from or to buckle under the burdens that destiny placed upon his gently-sloped shoulders.

It was around the time we met, some 20 years ago, that his son Mark was born.

Last Sunday, in the mid-afternoon, when the sky had become very grey and the air chilled to a pre-winter, discomforting cold by hard-blowing winds, hundreds of broken-hearted people helped to bury Mark.

It was the cruelest of all burdens yet for Alan and his grieving family.

Mark Wolfish was an exceptional young man, whose life ended after only two decades. Complications, it was believed, from a bone marrow transplant more than a year ago, were the cause of his final hospitalization.

He ultimately succumbed to a disease that slowly, surreptitiously prevented his body from regenerating and replenishing healthy, restorative blood.

The physical travail was severe, and yet, through the period of this last illness, Mark triumphed in ways that made those of us who heard its details sigh ever deeper, while wiping our tears, that he had been one of our very best.

Mark was a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, class of '97. Scores and scores of his high school classmates were at the funeral.

With remarkable composure and with tender though searing expressions of love, three of Mark's friends eulogized him, delivering their final farewells, as well as testimonies from friends in Jerusalem, who, because of distance and timing, could not be at the funeral.

As we listened, it quickly became apparent that Mark's humility and goodness had affected a great many people, had splashed his friends' lives with a measure of permanent illumination like a pinwheel perpetually swirling above, intermittently throwing a finely feathered ray of light onto our upturned foreheads.

Two days before he died, Mark's friends organized what they described as "a chain of prayer and chesed" that connected former classmates in Toronto, Montreal and Jerusalem. They studied in his name; they read psalms, tehillim, on his behalf; they fulfilled whatever mitzvot they could with him in mind, in furtherance of a love and a respect that they hoped could delay if not prevent an awaiting destiny.

"Two qualities above all," we learned from one of the young eulogizers, "characterized Mark: his will to live – strength, determination and courage – and his ever present consideration and kindness."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl addressed the sobbing and silent mourners, recounting stories and anecdotes of the young man's life that rounded out for us more of its benevolent, generous shape.

One story taught us as much about ourselves as it did about Mark.

During his final days, Mark was visited by some of his high school teachers, one of whom had taught him Talmud. Because of his sharply intuitive and analytical mind, Mark had excelled in Talmud just as he had in mathematics. Upon seeing his former teacher, Mark attempted to speak to him. But he could do so only barely. The illness had encroached too deeply by then. He was, however, able to say so that all around him could hear: "It's still me inside."

Knowing how frightful and fragile his outward appearance must have seemed to his visitors – frail, pale, entubed with science's devices – even then, he tried to abate their sense of gloom. He urged them to look past their fears, past their immediate senses, to see and to understand that the "person" who was their friend, "was still there," the mind and the soul of their friend Mark, "was still there," receiving them, though his body was diminished, weakened and weakening.

How often we surrender to our reluctance to visit someone sick and feeble in the hospital because our fear is so great!

How remarkable was this young man, Mark Wolfish, who, even then, so close to his final breath, felt it so important to give comfort to the comforters.

How remarkable too, were Mark's many friends, who, on a day when the sky had become very grey and the hard-blowing winds chilled the air, had gathered to return to him what had been his abiding gift to them, a measure of their friendship, love's permanent illumination

May his memory be for blessing.

Yad Vashem set to undergo major expansion

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Avner Shalev

TORONTO — Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial/museum in Jerusalem, is getting a major makeover.

In a $70 million (US) campaign to refurbish itself and keep pace with an avalanche of visitors, Yad Vashem has embarked on a crash building program.

Yad Vashem will get an International School for Holocaust Studies, a bigger museum, a new visitors' centre and an expanded archives.

It is also computerizing its vast database and making part of it available on the Internet, said the chairman of Yad Vashem's directorate, Avner Shalev.

In an interview, Shalev, a retired brigadier-general, explained that these changes are driven by demand.

Six years ago, Yad Vashem attracted 970,000 visitors, compared to 1.8 million so far this year. "We'll probably reach two million by the end of 1999," he said.

There has been "a tremendous growth" of interest in the Holocaust among Jews and non-Jews, said Shalev, who has headed Yad Vashem since 1993.

"More and more Jewish youngsters, secular and religious [though not necessarily haredi] see the Holocaust as a pathway to Jewish history, culture and identity."

The Holocaust, he added, is a unifying force among Jews, as well as a vehicle for combating assimilation.

At the same time, non-Jews, who currently comprise 80 percent of Yad Vashem's visitors' roll, regard the Holocaust as an event which endows them with a better understanding of the vagaries of human behaviour and of the notion of tolerance.

Yad Vashem's development plan is nothing if not ambitious.

The first new facility to come on stream, the International School for Holocaust Studies, will open on Chanukah, said Shalev, who was here under the auspices of the Canadian Society For Yad Vashem.

It will basically cater to three constituents: Israeli teachers; Israeli high school students, who must now attend a compulsory day-long seminar on the Holocaust; and overseas teachers. At present, Yad Vashem hosts 21 teachers' groups from abroad each year.

The historical museum, with 3,000 square metres of space, will open in 2003. The current 1,200-metre museum will be used for storage purposes after 2003.

The visitors' centre, complete with a cafeteria, will be ready in the spring of 2001.

New parking lots and an underground garage will accommodate 40 tour buses and almost 200 cars.

The 3,400-square-metre archival building, to be finished next March, will have room for Yad Vashem's collection of more than 55 million pages of documentation, some 150,000 photographs and an assortment of artifacts.

The facility will be able to absorb fresh material. On average, Yad Vashem receives two million pages of new documentation annually.

Shalev said that testimonials of Holocaust survivors, taped by filmmaker Steven Spielberg's foundation, will be stored in this building.

Computerization of Yad Vashem's database is already under way, Shalev noted. "We're halfway there."

The computerized database will begin functioning in February 2000. About 20 percent of it will be on the Internet.

Shalev disclosed that Yad Vashem is compiling a definitive master list of Holocaust victims.

"We expect to collect close to five million names, and this will take another few years. Most researchers will tell you that it's impossible to track down the names of all six million victims. The problem is that entire Jewish communities in the former Soviet Union were wiped out."

Shalev said that virtually all the new buildings will be subterannean and ecologically-friendly so as not to disturb Yad Vashem's park-like ambience.

Yad Vashem's transformation will be financed by various means. "The Israeli government has allocated $15 million, and the rest will be raised in Israel and the Diaspora."

Shalev, 60, has a personal stake in Yad Vashem. His parents, Polish Jews from Galicia who settled in Palestine in 1935, lost many of their relatives in the Holocaust.

He believes that Holocaust denial, the basis of which is anti-Semitism and neo-Nazism, is growing slightly.

Yad Vashem, he acknowledged, has not been fully engaged in the struggle against this phenomenon. "Maybe we're making a mistake."

He is concerned by the success of Joerg Haider's right-wing Freedom party in Austria's recent election. "Haider expresses a neo-fascist outlook of xenophobia and Austrian superiority over foreigners."

If he becomes a member of the government, Israel should suspend diplomatic relations with Austria, Shalev said.

"Had Austria come to terms with its Nazi past earlier, Haider would have won fewer votes."

kind of a brotherhood. It's only natural for me to help."

According to Duguid, the two days of labour-intensive work would probably cost $3,000, at the going rates.

On observing part of the clean-up, Danny Fine, director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's community relations committee, said the scene was "truly a juxtaposition of profound evil and profound good. It reinforces one's faith in human nature."

Ont. court declares Shalom-K Tours bankrupt

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shalom-K Tours Ltd., once a well-known Toronto travel agency that specialized in trips to Israel, has been declared bankrupt.

Earlier this month, a judge of Ontario's Superior Court of Justice declared Shalom-K bankrupt for failure to pay debts to El Al and Air Canada.

The agency owed El Al over $688,000 and Air Canada more than $25,000 for tickets it had sold. The carriers attempted to collect the money in the normal fashion – through a trust arrangement with the International Air Transport Association (IATA) – but in each case, the debits were rejected by Shalom-K's bank, the court stated.

"The amount collected for tickets sold should have been in the trust fund, but insufficient funds were available to cover [Shalom-K's] obligations," Judge Katherine Swinton wrote in her Nov. 4 ruling.

IATA pursued the claims on behalf of the airlines (CJN, Oct. 21).

An affidavit from the court-appointed interim receiver said there was a shortfall of $707,328 in Shalom-K's trust account.

Swinton also found evidence of over $100,000 owed by Shalom-K to the Travel Industry Council of Ontario (TICO), which paid out the money to compensate travellers who had placed deposits on tickets bought from the agency.

TICO, which monitors the travel industry and enforces provincial laws, has yet to file a formal request for the money, the court noted.

A few weeks ago, Shalom-K voluntarily withdrew its registration from TICO, meaning, in effect, that the agency relinquished its licence.

The family-owned travel wholesaler was founded in 1982.

It is now up to the receiver to determine how to proceed with a lawsuit launched by Shalom-K two weeks before the bankruptcy decision. The suit seeks $50 million in damages, and alleges breach of contract, conspiracy and interference with economic relations against El Al and its Canadian director of operations, Moshe Shamai; and against Peerless Travel Inc., and its director, Ehud Telem.

Shalom-K founder Shalom Even told The CJN his business's bankruptcy will result in "a huge loss" for El Al because more than half of all trips from Canada to Israel were handled by his agency and the Israeli airline.

Agunah Get Day planned for November 30

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — L'maan B'nos Yisrael International has announced that a pre-Chanukah Agunah Get Day is planned for Nov. 30.

Mattie Klein, founder of the volunteer-run New York based organization, said in a phone interview from New York that "people all over the world are challenged to encourage recalcitrant husbands and fathers of Jewish children to give their agunah wives a get before Chanukah."

Batei din will be prepared in various locations in the United States and Canada, she said, to facilitate the get process. Her organization will "cover the cost of the sofer in an attempt to participate in this great mitzvah.

"The agunah crisis has caused epidemic and tragic consequences for the entire Jewish community.

"As a result of abuse of Torah law by those seeking personal gain by hurting unsuspecting Jewish women, the lives of Jewish women are being sold for profit by individuals who fear no one. There seems to be no end to the extent to which individuals will go to profit from the newly established agunah industry," said Klein.

L'maan B'nos Yisrael International has updated its guidelines and recommendations to give those individuals who need to go through the beit din get process, "a sense of what they should expect, what they should tolerate, and what they should avoid." she said.

Klein recently travelled to Israel to read the names of agunot at Rachel's Tomb on Oct. 21, the anniversary of Rachel's death. "I carried the names of 125 women, who either cannot get a get, or received one at sometimes irretrievable costs.

"Before I left, I got calls from people begging me to pray, and to thank me for what I was doing. Hopefully God will have mercy on these women who cannot have husbands and children until the matter is resolved."

On Nov. 30, Jews are encouraged to repeat the prayer written by Rabbi Mordechai Tendler. It can be found in the Sept. 2 edition of The CJN.

Copies of the guidelines may be obtained by calling the organization's office at 718-338-0833.

Books essential for continuity: Rabbi Hartman

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Books must continue to play a meaningful role in bringing Jews together, said Rabbi Donniel Hartman.

We are a people who have already survived thousand of years because of our books, he said, and the Jewish Book Fair is a celebration of this fact.

Rabbi Hartman spoke at the recent opening of the 23rd annual Jewish Book Fair at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The evening featured A Heart of Many Rooms: Celebrating the many voices within Judaism, by Rabbi David Hartman.

In speaking about the ideas in his father's book, Rabbi Donniel Hartman said the sharing of books leads to a shared culture and community in which all Jews can find a sense of belonging.

He said his father believes that Judaism must celebrate complexity and allow for the multiplicity of ideas.

"We must first start with the premise that there are multiple places and voices within Judaism."

In an interview before the opening, Rabbi Hartman said that "all branches of Judaism are meaningful – Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, secular, traditional, Reconstructionist – as long as they are asking, do you want to engage in this tradition in a meaningful way."

Today, as a result of our commitment to our particular passions, we are unable to love our people, to celebrate together, or even eat together, he said.

"It is unfortunate that kashrut and eating at a common table, the very thing that was supposed to draw people together, is now a source of tension. Laws of kashrut are meant to serve the needs of the Jewish people – if we don't use them that way, then we are abusing the laws of kashrut."

There are ways to solve the problems that are separating us, he said, as long as there is a desire and we continue interpreting.

In discussing the Shulchan Aruch, a codification of Jewish law which literally means "the set table," Rabbi Hartman said, "My father never taught me the Shulchan Aruch, because there is a right and a wrong answer in the Shulchan Aruch. When it is a set table, most Jews don't have a place at that table.

"Instead, my father celebrates the radical, innovative spirit of the Talmud. Everyone disagrees with each other and they're all on the same page."

Rabbi Donniel Hartman

Judaism cannot be based on one voice, Rabbi Hartman said. We have to work towards a pluralistic, multicultural society based on a shared memory.

"The meaning of a people," he said, "is a collection of individuals who share something in common.

"The essence of Judaism is for those individuals to be part of a story and a shared memory. If you try to understand the past and argue with it, then you make it yours.

"One of the great tragedies of Israel is that modern Israeli youth don't believe that they have access to that shared memory."

They then feel disenfranchised, Rabbi Hartman said.

"We have to be careful that we're not giving up our peoplehood for the sake of our Jewishness."

A people cannot be like a synagogue, said Rabbi Hartman. Those who don't agree with other members, can change synagogues. But you can't change your people.

"Our challenge is to build a meaningful, vibrant, Jewish people, where all voices can find a space.

"In today's environment, the secret for both Israel and the Diaspora," he said "is not to panic about issues of modernity, continuity and pluralism. Panic can only lead to short-term solutions.

"The Renaissance didn't happen overnight. We need a longer term, a 50 year process. It is important, that Jews take the time to develop rooms for books, and for ideas and for multiple dialogues."

The Book Fair opening was chaired by Marilyn Jacobs. Greetings were brought by Dorothy Shoichet, president of the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Elyse Goldman of the New Leadership Division, Toronto chapter, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, introduced Rabbi Hartman and praised his work as an educator able to respond to the crisis facing the Jewish world today.

Rabbi David Hartman, philosopher, author, social activist and professor emeritus, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, is the founder and director of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem.

In the closing remarks, Rabbi Steven Salzman of Adath Israel Congregation said, just as Isaac widened the wells Abraham had dug in Genesis, so did Donniel widen the intellectual paths of his father. "Charisma must be a gene that is passed down from father to son," he said.

Craven avoidance, shallow smokescreen

Two weeks ago the United Nations committee on human rights formally ruled that the government of Ontario's educational funding policy discriminates against non-Catholic Ontarians who pay taxes toward the public and separate Catholic school system, but who receive no funding from the government for their own schools.

The ruling was handed down in a case brought to the international body by Arieh Waldman, whose children attend Bialik Hebrew Day Schools.

The Ontario government responded to the ruling by issuing a clipped, almost peevishly petulant press release that deliberately sidestepped the issue and attempted to divert attention away from the heart of the Waldman complaint and the resultant UN ruling.

The government affirmed that it remains "committed to the existing publicly funded education system." But this is as it should be. No one was suggesting that the government abandon its commitment to the publicly funded education system.

"The Ontario government will continue to uphold its constitutional obligation and fund public and separate schools fully." But this too is as it should be. No one was suggesting that the government stop funding public and separate schools fully.

"The Ontario government is committed to providing an excellent public education system that is open to all students regardless of religious or cultural backgrounds." This too is as it should be. Imagine the government not being committed to an excellent public education system!

The government's response was to ignore the decision. It did not deal at all with the central issue in the UN body's ruling, namely, the lack of fundamental fairness in the government's education funding policy. Far worse, however was the fact that the government implied that the UN committee and by inference, the complainant Waldman, were somehow advocating the dismantling or the dilution of the public education system in Ontario. This, of course, is patently and pungently false.

That has never been the objective of the parents of children in non-Catholic private schools. These parents have asked, simply and only, for equal treatment with respect to the general studies portion of their children's school curriculum and the non-educational health and other services that Ontario schools provide their pupils.

During the Ontario election campaign last spring, Premier Mike Harris and his colleagues strongly suggested – and to some minds, promised – that his government would provide funds to all Ontario students for non-educational health and other services.

The handing down by the UN of its condemnatory ruling was the perfect opportunity for the premier and his education minister Janet Ecker to announce, finally, at least this funding. That they chose not to, was immensely disappointing. That they chose rather, to respond with the same craven avoidance and ineffectual, shallow smokescreen, was a disgrace. What then, is there left to say about the government's approach to educational funding except that, in addition to being unfair, it may also be dishonest and expedient.

Warm welcome for convert

I would like to respond to Marlane Smith's article, "Does Judaism Want Me?" (CJN, Nov. 4), in which she shares her feelings about converting to Judaism, and questions Judaism's interest in her contribution.

As a young Jewish woman engaged in the struggle of what it means to be a Jew – by blood connection, through religious training, and in questioning the conversion of a potential life-partner who also has a familial Jewish connection – I can understand your confusion in taking these steps, Marlane. Indeed, even as a Jew by birth, my own identity has been unrelentingly challenged.

Today, many fear losing the commitment of those Jews who are loosely affiliated. The preference to "gain an outsider" over "losing an insider" may be understandable in our modern context. But please do not doubt your unique potential for contributing to our community! The Torah itself speaks to the critical importance of "the other."

Yitro the Midianite's advice to Moses ultimately served to found the first Jewish justice system. And in the Book of Ruth, where Ruth the Moabite joins the Jewish people, it is written that the future redemptive messianic figure will descend from her lineage.

I deeply wish to extend a warm welcome to you, Marlane, to our community. Kol Hakavod for taking the daring leaps that you describe. I wish you and your future husband an enriching and challenging journey. I believe that the challenges ultimately yield fruitful growth for Jew and convert alike.

Questions Zegota story

In the story by Frances Kraft, "Polish Organization Zegota Helped Jews During the War" (CJN, Oct. 28), she writes about Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, who co-founded the organization in Poland in 1942. In a speech in Toronto, Bartoszewski said that the organization helped Jews (especially Jewish children) with money, medication and thousands of pieces of false identification. He also stated that his organization had Jewish members.

Did Kraft ask the professor what happened to the Jewish members of his organization? Can he show us at least one member who survived? Did she ask him how many Jewish children the organization helped and how many of them survived? Did she ask Bartoszewski why the Germans freed him from Auschwitz when it was almost impossible for a Pole to get out?

In recent years, I have been trying to find at least one living soul who survived thanks to Zegota, and I have had no results. To me, the subject of Zegota is the biggest bluff of the 20th century.

Says Koren is anti-Israel

My belief is that The CJN exists in favour of all Jews in Canada and probably also in favour of those living in our one and only Jewish state, which is Israel. Israel is unique in the whole world, with the good and the bad that exists there. The fact that there are people who have left Israel years ago and still call themselves Israelis, simply demonstrates that it's a place that one's heart cannot tear itself from.

Yet, this does not give one the right to be a spectator, and take every single opportunity to defame that country, as does Gidi Koren in his column "Let it stay between us" (CJN, Nov. 4). I wonder who are those "us" that Gidi Koren relates to? We and many of our Israeli friends here in Montreal are offended time and again by his unhidden hatred for the Israeli state, people and customs.

As this is the only Hebrew-language article printed in The CJN, I find it very insulting for me, as an Israeli living in Canada, to run into this type of unleashed style of writing.

Gidi Koren's permanent generalities about "all the Israelis" and about "the character of Israel," always in negative connections, very much remind me of the best of anti-Semitic rhetoric. With such friends, we really don't need enemies, and we don't want this simply to stay between us.

Abide by UN decision

The UN's human rights committee ruled on Friday, Nov. 5, that Ontario's school funding violates an international agreement by funding Catholic schools and not those of other faiths (CJN, Nov. 11). Janet Ecker, Ontario minister of education, immediately dismissed the ruling, stating Ontario will ignore it completely.

In an open letter to the minister, I wrote: "I was taken aback by your response to the United Nations Human Rights decision with respect to the fair funding issue. Canada has a tradition of fighting for the dignity and human rights of others around the world. Canadians uphold the decision made by the United Nations when it impacts on others, yet you immediately dismiss their decision when it affects us. How hypocritical this is on your part.

"The entire world community has now recognized that funding the Catholic population and not other religions is contrary to the human rights of the citizens of Ontario. You have a moral obligation as the minister of education to ensure that all the citizens of Ontario are treated equally. I sincerely hope you adhere to the oath you took upon being sworn in as the minister of education and that you abide by the United Nations' decision."

Kindly encourage your readers to fax Ecker at 416-325-2608 or David Young, parliamentary assistant for education at 416-325-2368. Let our elected officials realize how we as a community feel.

Perspectives

German Jewish life rising again

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Inna Orlowski sits at an outdoor cafe near the Jewish high school in Berlin, sipping a cappuccino.

It is a long way from Russia's Ural Mountains, where Orlowski, 20, with close-cropped blond curls and a ready smile, was born – and a long way from Israel, where she wants to be.

Across town, Inna Slavskaja, 44, a Yiddish singer from Birobidzhan, smokes another cigarette. Her husband, Igor, died three years ago, and she is raising their son, Genja, now 11, alone.

"I see myself as Jewish," says Slavskaja, a small, dark-haired woman with sad eyes. But Genja, though born in Ukraine, feels like a German.

In the evening, Lyonia, an engineer from Lithuania, sits in a grocery store and watches his wife, Marina, a slightly plump woman with dyed blond hair, count the pfennigs of another drunkard making a small purchase. Lyonia, 53, a short man with glasses and a receding hairline, had wanted to emigrate to America. For now, the two, who requested that their last names not be published, live in Germany.

These people are among the tens of thousands of Jews who, instead of going to Israel, caught the wave of freedom that swept the former Soviet Union after the fall of communism and rode it into the land they always associated with Hitler and death camps

In the last decade of the century, their arrival has dramatically changed the Jewish landscape of Germany, more than doubling Germany's Jewish population and making Germany the only country in Europe whose Jewish population is significantly growing.

In fact, since 1990, Germany's official Jewish population has risen from 35,000 to 75,000, nearly one-fifth of its prewar level.

With Germany settling its immigrants on a per-state quota basis, new Jewish communities are being established virtually overnight in towns and cities where no Jews have lived since World War II. In some cities, like Munich, Berlin and Frankfurt, the Jewish population has soared.

"I believe in the year 2004 we will have 100,000 Jews in Germany, making it one of the largest Jewish communities in Europe," said Michel Friedman, a Frankfurt attorney and member of the board of the Central Council of Jews in Germany. He is a possible contender to replace the late Ignatz Bubis as council president.

There are now nearly 12,000 Jews in Berlin alone, a tiny minority in this city of 3.8 million inhabitants, but Berlin now has a Jewish community larger than that of many other major European cities.

"The immigrants brought back life into a community that was in danger of being very over-aged, to put it lightly," said Nicola Galliner, director of Jewish adult education programming in Berlin.

"We have two Jewish junior high schools and one high school in Berlin, and none of these schools would have been possible without these immigrants."

The immigrants are old and young, resigned and hopeful.

Pushed to leave the former Soviet Union as a result of economic hardship, anti-Semitism or fears for the future in chaotic new conditions, all have personal reasons for choosing Germany over Israel, where hundreds of thousands of other ex-Soviet Jews have immigrated since 1990. These reasons include Germany's liberal policy in accepting ex-Soviet Jews, not to mention a desire by many to live in a country which is both a solid democracy and a firm member of the European Union.

"It's very difficult to get to America, and you can't get into England," said a Berlin Jewish activist who asked to remain anonymous. "Germany has the highest standard of living in Europe. It's Germany or Israel, and if you are desperate you will go anywhere."

The Slavskajas, for example, left Ukraine in 1991, after learning that their son's playground had radioactive sand in it, probably from Chernobyl.

"I knew Germany took Jewish families," said Inna Slavskaja, who had cousins in Berlin. "We came with two suitcases."

Germany's open door for Jews is no accident. It is connected with the country's sense of responsibility for the Holocaust. After the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991, Germany established a liberal immigration policy for Jews. They are eligible for housing, financial aid, language instruction and help in finding work.

They may also become German citizens more quickly than usual, a right usually extended only to immigrants from ethnic German families. Under European Union regulations, citizens of one member country have the right to live and work in any E.U. country.

The influx has presented major challenges as well as rewards.

How does the established Jewish community integrate a largely non-religious population? And how does Germany justify its liberal policy toward Jewish immigration, when more than four million Germans are unemployed and when Israel wants these Jewish immigrants for itself?

To be sure, Germany's Jewish newcomers often have little connection to the Holy Land, and little more than a piece of paper certifying their Jewishness.

The Israeli Consulate in Berlin.

Raised in the Communist atheist tradition, they usually have more cultural than religious bonds to Judaism. But the Hebrew stamp on one's passport – once associated with discrimination – is now virtually a ticket out of a world whose poverty and growing xenophobia outweigh the advantages of free speech and free enterprise.

With enough rubles, one can buy proof of a Jewish maternal grandmother on the black market.

"It's true that a lot of people would like to be Jewish because they have a better chance to get out," says Michael Liokumowitsch, the official trouble-shooter on integration issues for Berlin's Jewish community. Liokumowitsch, 40, is a dental surgeon whose family emigrated from Russia in 1974.

A Jewish woman reflects in silence at the site of a vandalized gravestone.

[Reuters/RNS photos]

In some cases, he said, the community does something to check, such as asking people who are visiting Russia to see if a certain person is known in a Jewish community or not.

But Jewish leaders say fakers pose less of a challenge than does the task of integration.

Newcomers need to learn German and find homes and jobs. Jewish leaders would like them to show an interest in religion, and not just to use Judaism as a ticket for social help.

For some, the process has produced resounding success.

"In Frankfurt we have had an unbelievable infusion of oxygen into Jewish life with these former Soviet Jews," Friedman said. "They are creative; a lot of them are artists, and the younger generation is very quickly integrated."

But many who work with new immigrants express frustration and even cynicism.

"After 10 years, people here still make their Passover seders in Russian," said Judith Kessler, who has been handling immigration issues for the Jewish community in Berlin since 1990, co-ordinating language classes, vocational training, social clubs, and publishing a German-Russian Jewish magazine.

"We have done something wrong," said Kessler, who herself came to Germany from Poland in 1972. "We took them by the hand and served them in their own language."

Andy Steiman, who until recently was acting rabbi for the former East German state of Mecklenberg, dismissed the idea of a real "Jewish revival." It's just numbers, he said.

He told of a young couple who met at a Passover seder they had attended because it meant a free meal.

"When they got married," he said, "they didn't want to have a chupah because they think it is antiquated. And when they had a baby boy, they didn't want to have him circumcised because they claimed it is a human right not to be harmed bodily."

Ironically, some of the new immigrants who most want to be involved Jewishly are, as children of Jewish fathers and gentile Mothers, not considered Jewish according to Halachah, and thus, according to community regulations, cannot take part in all official communal activities.

"It's a big problem," said Kessler. "They say, rightly, 'In Russia we were Jews, and here we are Russian. Why will no one have us?' "

But some, she said, are getting "closer to Judaism" in a variety of ways. Some, for example, are taking conversion classes, with some men even being circumcised. Others are immersing themselves in a cultural rather than religious Jewish orientation.

Inna Slavskaja's Yiddish cabaret performances attract good-sized crowds around Germany, mostly non-Jewish. Her identity is more cultural than religious. But her son is talking about a bar mitzvah.

"I have nothing against it," she said. "It will take a lot of practice, but I am happy."

And Inna Orlowski, a member of the first graduating class of Berlin's new Jewish high school, is part of a back-to-Judaism movement among young people.

"My grandparents had decided against Jewish life and for communist ideals," she said. "Now, we can begin again to rebuild the relationship to Judaism. If I don't do it, then for my children, it would not be possible."

Throughout the postwar period, the prevalent view of world Jewry was that no Jews should live in Germany.

Until the influx of immigration over the past decade, the Jewish community consisted mainly of eastern European Jewish survivors who ended up in displaced persons camps after the war, and their descendants. Many openly said that they lived "with packed suitcases" ready – just in case.

"For the Jew, it is always a difficult decision to come to Germany," Liokumowitsch said. "The generation who suffered directly [from the Holocaust] is still alive. On the other hand, Germany has changed, and we have to ask ourselves, 'What is the alternative?' "

Still, whether Jews should live in post-Holocaust Germany is eternally debatable. Sometimes, ironically, immigrants encounter more overt discrimination in Germany than they faced at home. Two years ago, citizens of the economically depressed eastern German town of Gollwitz demonstrated against plans to place 50 Russian Jewish immigrants in their midst.

German xenophobia is most often directed against the millions of Turks and other foreigners living in the country, but a series of recent anti-Semitic episodes, including the desecration of the biggest Jewish cemetery in Berlin, has put the community on guard.

The fact is, however, that, 10 years after the fall of communism and more than half a century after the Holocaust, Jews are in Germany, building new lives.

"It's certainly good that Jews want to live in Germany and are no longer afraid," said Orlowski, the student from the Urals.

"I don't believe that the young German born yesterday should carry guilt on his shoulders," said Slavskaja, the Yiddish singer from Birobidzhan.

"We must be sure that never happens again."

"Maybe in 15, 20 years, when the young extremists come to their senses, it will be better here," said Lyonia, the engineer from Lithuania. "Whoever doesn't take a risk, gets nothing."

Opinions

Into the cold

By the time this column is published, the first serious harbingers of winter will have made themselves felt and spread their not-so-tender tendrils for all to feel.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The people who fear the onset of the wintry weather more than anybody else are those who have no permanent shelter to call their own, the homeless whose condition is becoming an ever increasing plight in the midst of one of the wealthiest nations in the world.

By this time it is well known that Holy Blossom Temple is part of a network of religious institutions that, week after week, try to ease the plight of the homeless. It does so with a bevy of dedicated volunteers, some infusion of cash and a heap of determination.

The result has been spectacular, and the old Jewish saying that "the reward of a mitzvah is doing a mitzvah" has been borne out over and over again for those who are privileged to participate in the effort.

I do not have the latest statistics at hand, but here is what it looked like a little while ago. (It has no doubt become worse since then.)

In an eight-year period, almost 200,000 different people have used shelters at hostels in Toronto. Nearly half of them were families with children – and amongst those families, children and youth under 18 were the fastest growing group of users.

Translated into figures, this means that at the time the statistics were taken, more than 5,000 children were living in public hostels.

It appears that almost 50 percent of the homeless people in Toronto are coming from outside the city, which means that we have a constantly growing problem on our hands.

A half a year ago, Anne Golden, president of United Way, submitted a widely hailed report of the Homelessness Action Task Force that she chaired. Toronto's City Council adopted it in May with very few amendments, and today it represents the official policy of Metropolitan Toronto.

Put baldly, the problem of homelessness in our city – and I suspect in other large cities in the country as well – is a blight that is likely to get worse, especially if public policies will reduce the amount of affordable housing more and more.

The province bears a large share of responsibility in this respect, but so does the federal government. We cannot afford to leave the solution to the cities alone. They do not have the resources of doing it all by themselves.

I write this column for two reasons: because the problem is so urgent and it is essential that we spread a keen awareness of it as quickly and as far as possible; and because I want to salute Anne Golden for her great work.

I am delighted to know that on Sunday evening, Dec. 5, she will be the honoree at the annual Negev dinner, sponsored by the Jewish National Fund in Toronto. No one deserves this honour more than she.

Food and Jewish mothers

It's Sunday evening and my refrigerator is full. Not only is it full, but there seem to be all these colourful objects I'm unfamiliar with. I believe, in some circles, they're known as vegetables. These foreign objects sit in a drawer-like compartment called a crisper that I've never seen the inside of before. There can only be one explanation for the invasion of greenery – my mother's recent visit.

Jennifer Lee on campus in Halifax

November is an evil month for students. Between catching up on the missed work due to studying for midterms and preparing for the plethora of assignments with pressing deadlines, the typical university student has no idea what the grocery store looks like. Nor do these poor, overburdened, under-appreciated souls know what clean dishes are, or even what clean laundry is, for that matter.

I, sad to say, am no exception. Under the egotistical notion that I could actually understand a class on scary philosophers such as Immanuel Kant or Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, I've been consumed with a paper on these men, ignoring my household duties. The only time I've been inspired to clean was when I hit the brick wall of intellectual writer's block. Cleaning equals procrastination.

But more about my mother.

Now I'm not so self-serving that I would ask my mom to shlep all the way out to Halifax from Toronto merely to fill my fridge and cook me my favourite things. No, I thought it would be nice – and she agreed – if she finally saw my apartment, met my roommate and attended the play I wrote, which was performed at my school. Now, if she just so happened to buy a few items here or there or made one or three dishes for my roommate and me, then who was I to complain?

I don't know the origin of the stereotyped connection between food and Jewish mothers. I do know that it's true. My mother was pretty much appalled when everything I owned could be classified as a health hazard. Not to mention her horror at discovering I only had completely nutritionally void white bread. In my defence, at least I had bread.

With my mother here it would have seemed wrong not to have her make blintzes since they are what I crave most from home. (My bagel dependency has lessened over the years, plus she brought a dozen with her.) Unfortunately, the local grocery didn't have the proper cheese filling. Now my mother's a resourceful woman so she asked herself, "Who knows about blintzes?" and immediately called the synagogue to find out where to buy the necessities of Jewish life.

The blintzes landed on the table and my roommate and I were instructed to eat. I, of course, scooped some sour cream onto my plate and dug right in. My roommate, a nice Catholic girl from New Brunswick, was a little hesitant. Her only blintz exposure was the time in first year when the residence's cafeteria made some at my request. After that little experiment, I didn't bother to suggest any more recipes.

I think my roommate liked the meal. I know she was amused when my mom and I got into a theological discussion. Now this isn't a normal occurrence when we get together. In fact, it was rather bizarre – like the beginning of a bad joke: So two Jews and a Catholic are having blintzes and discussing God…

The next day, lasagna and latkes (since I'm not home for Chanukah this year) were made. I got step-by-step instructions on the preparations. My mother often tells me how to make things. I nod my head at the appropriate times, but I never eat the dish until the next time I see her.

Call it laziness. Call it a fear of the oven. Call it a complete inability to operate any appliance associated with the kitchen.

I think some foods are just tastier when my mother makes them.

My kosher lifestyle

My friends constantly remind me that I am a very difficult person to take out to dinner.

It's not that they find me hard to look at while I am eating (I always chew with my mouth closed); nor that I don't know how to hold a fork and knife or remember to put my napkin on my lap. I'm not difficult to take out to dinner because I'm a picky eater (although I don't do eggs or fish), nor because my palate constantly yearns for new and exotic foods (because salad and a piece of chicken seven days a week are more than satisfying for me).

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

The reason they make the above claim is that I keep kosher. And the more I think about it, the more I believe it should be my mother doing the complaining rather than my friends.

When I was in Grade 10, I decided that I was going to start keeping kosher. I was brought up in a traditional household where we never mixed milk and meat and we had kosher for Passover food, but not necessarily separate dishes. Now, I have my own kosher meat drawer in the freezer, my own set of dishes (consisting of two plates and a bowl) for Passover, and I go to the kosher bakery every Friday to buy challah and any other necessary provisions.

Once I leave my house, I am also well taken care of. Around the campus, there are two kosher restaurants. One is located in Hillel House and the other at Chabad. And when we are invited to our family friends' homes, not only do our four bodies pile into the Hommobile, but so does my kosher meal.

I decided to abide by the laws of kashrut, leaving my friends and family to drool over delicacies such as – it's actually not really that important what they eat.

My decision, in its practicability, is not a major one. While admittedly it requires a bit of advanced planning because I am in it alone in my circle, it is no more of an inconvenience than remembering to brush your teeth before you go to sleep or fastening your seat belt before you drive out of your driveway.

When I move out, my kitchen will be as kosher as I can keep it. I know that I am extremely fortunate to live in a city where kosher food is both plentiful and easily accessible. I should not take that for granted.

It is the significance of my decision to keep kosher that is far more complex and raises many questions among my friends and family about my beliefs and future life plans.

My motto over the past 6½ years has been, "As long as you don't put it on my plate, I don't care what you eat." I have therefore attempted to have my kashrut "policy" interfere as minimally as possible with the lives of my friends and family. It doesn't offend me that my brother spends every dinner elbowing me while he is chomping away at his chicken while I eat mine.

My friends can think of me as a difficult date when we go out to dinner. But me, I like to think of myself as having chosen a certain way of life, which happens to be distinct from that of my peers. I can only try to impress upon my friends the positive value of keeping kosher, but I cannot force them to do anything except respect my decision.

It is worth noting, I believe, that I have spent my entire time writing this piece with my ear glued to the phone, listening to an airline's elevator music, while I attempt to order a kosher meal.

Food excites Thelma Barer-Stein

Thelma Barer-Stein, a gastronomic maven, bores to the point. "I have a love affair with food," said the author of You Eat What You Are (Firefly Books), an authoritative guide to the culinary traditions of more than 50 national cuisines, including Israeli and Jewish.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

She has been on a gustatory journey since childhood. "I grew up immersed in food," explained Barer-Stein, a dietician by training, and a developmental book editor by vocation.

Barer-Stein's parents, Austrian immigrants Michael and Fanny, ran Barer's Delicatessen, something of a landmark in Vancouver, for 40 years. Expert cooks, they were renowned for their cured and smoked meats, roasted chickens, briny pickles and tart sauerkraut. "My father's pickles were incredible. He was an amazing man."

As a teenager, she and her two brothers helped out in the store. "I peeled potatoes, sliced salami and served customers. It would have been impossible for me not to have developed a sensitivity for food."

This finely-honed sensibility permeates You Eat What You Are, a popular work originally published in 1979, which engagingly examines the role of food in our daily lives.

As she puts it: "Food is much more than as tool of survival. Food is a source of pleasure, comfort and security. Food is also a symbol of hospitality, social status and religious significance.

"What we select to eat, how we prepare it, serve it, and even how we eat it are all factors profoundly touched by our individual cultural inheritance."

Barer-Stein, who still recalls the tantalizing aromas which enveloped her father's shop, believes that food preferences are bound up with geography and history.

In centuries past, European explorers set off on arduous voyages in search of fresh sources of foods, seasonings, herbs, spices and preservatives. "Exploration," she said, "changed food customs and habits. Almost everything we eat is from somewhere else."

From Latin America, the Spanish brought back cocoa, the main ingredient in chocolate, as well as such modern staples as tomatoes, vanilla, pumpkins and squash. The coffee bean was found in Africa, while the tea leaf was discovered in Asia.

Marco Polo, that intrepid Italian adventurer who penetrated the depths of China, introduced the west to pasta, ice cream and, now it can be revealed – gefilte fish. "The Chinese," she said, "were making gefilte fish, tiny fish dumplings, thousands of years ago."

And cholent, Sabbath fare favoured by Ashkenazi Jews, was originally a North American aboriginal dish flavored by long, slow cooking.

Jewish cookery has been shaped by external influences, she observed, sitting demurely in her pretty garden, sipping home-made lemon juice and nibbling on apple cake sprinkled with bits of nuts.

"Wherever Jews have lived, they've taken the local food and adopted it to kashrut. We think corn beef and pastrami are Jewish, but in fact they originated in Romania. And bagels and borscht are Ukrainian."

Citing yet more examples, Barer-Stein spoke of Balkan Jews, who thrive on eggplant dishes and phyllo pastries; of Bukharan Jews, who feast on rice pilaus; of Austrian and Hungarian Jews, who dine on schnitzels; of Moroccan and Tunisian Jews, who have an affinity for tajines; and of Greek and Bulgarian Jews, who make a meal out of moussaka.

And, lest it not be known, there are definite Ashkenazi and Sephardi food preferences, all rooted in geography. In general, Ashkenazim are partial to vegetables, potatoes, onions, cabbage, beets and mushrooms, while Sephardim usually gravitate to eggplants, peppers, leeks, okra, fennel and olives.

Thelma Barer-Stein

Ashkenazim like grains such as wheat, barley and buckwheat, while Sephardim enjoy couscous, semolina and bulgar. Ashkenazim are attracted to flavourings like vanilla and lemon, but Sephardim prefer almond essence, rose flower water and tamarind.

Paprika, salt, pepper, dill and parsley are the spices of choice for Ashkenazim, but Sephardim are drawn to cinnamon, clove, sumac, cardamom, cumin and saffron.

Barer-Stein, a Torontonian who's partial to fruits, vegetables and fish, spent five years researching and writing her magnum opus.

She consulted cookbooks, novels, explorers' diaries and archives. She never used a fact unless she could substantiate it in three different places.

In the interests of authenticity, she cooked her way through the manuscript, whipping up a panoply of dishes ranging from African and Armenian to Turkish and Vietnamese.

Although her palate is thoroughly eclectic, she particularly fancies Mediterranean, Middle Eastern and Austrian food.

Strangely enough, her manuscript was rejected by 32 publishers before McClelland & Stewart finally accepted it. The reasons varied, but each rejection brought tears to her eyes.

She was not discouraged. "I believed in the book. It has been a central force in my life. It threw me into writing and publishing."

The mother of four grown children, all of whom can work magic with a spatula, she thought long and hard about a second edition. But there was never time. "I was pursuing a PhD in adult education," said Barer-Stein, a graduate of the University of Toronto.

Much to her disappointment, McClelland & Stewart had no interest in a revised edition. Firefly, however, was keen to do it.

"The book was like a baby that kept growing," she said. "It took nine months of intensive work to gestate."

The new and improved You Eat What You Are is twice the size of the old one, contains a glossary, a 48-page index and additional chapters on Tibetan, Indonesian, Malay and Singaporean food.

Furthermore, the chapter on Israeli and Jewish food has been updated and expanded. "The book has been very lovingly produced," she observed. "Firefly has outdone itself."

Since the publication of the first edition, the place of food in everyday life has undergone a revolution.

"We don't speak in pejorative terms about 'ethnic' food anymore. We talk about diversity," she noted.

The global market, the Internet, travel and waves of immigration have had a profound effect on people's perception. "We live in a McLuhan global village today."

As a result, supermarkets carry a much greater variety of fresh herbs, imported fruits and vegetables, seasonings, flavored oils, condiments and sauces.

And since far more women have joined the workforce and with many of them unable to devote themselves as assiduously to food preparation as in the past, there has been a proliferation of processed, frozen and fast foods.

The last two decades have also had a marked impact on Jews who are faithful to the laws of kashrut. "We're more open to different styles of cooking," said Barer-Stein, a lecturer who once had her own cooking show on television. "Me and Madame Benoit were the only ones doing that in the 1950s."

Barer-Stein is a fastidious eater who considers cooking a form of relaxation. "I eat the way you're supposed, like a dietician," she chuckled.

She enjoys three balanced meals a day, not counting fruit snacks. "I'm not tempted to gorge," said Barer-Stein, a slim woman of medium height who has obviously taken her own advice to heart.

The Jews of Poland

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Prof. Gershon Hundert, the distinguished historian and chair of the Department of Jewish Studies at McGill University, beguiled an audience of Jewish genealogists last summer in New York with midrash-like tales of early Jewish history in Poland.

For centuries, the Jews felt very comfortable in Poland, Hundert said, referring to stories that even the name of the country may have derived from Hebrew. "Po-lin," he said, may have been Hebrew for "dwell here," while the variant "Po-lan-ya" may have meant "Here dwells the Lord."

According to legend, a Polish king named Kazimierz took a Jewish wife named Esterka at the beginning of the 16th century. The royal couple supposedly raised their sons as Christians, their daughters as Jews.

"Esterka used her feminine charms to convince the king to let Jews into Poland," Hundert said. Then he added, tongue-in-cheek: "The confirmation of Esterka's historicity is the fact that you can find her grave in several Polish towns."

Poland's early Jews had "a low level of exilic consciousness" and hired Italian architects to design their synagogues and houses, he said. "They had about themselves a sense of permanence, as if they knew that here they would stay a long time."

Despite invasions by Cossacks, Muscovites and Swedes, the Jews increased in number in Poland-Lithuania in the 18th century. According to a census taken about 1765, there were some 550,000 Jews in Poland and another 200,000 in Lithuania. The region was the centre of the Jewish world.

"It was a massive community, growing more quickly than the rest of the population. This was not due to a higher birth rate but to a lower death rate. The incidence of Jewish infant mortality was lower."

Why did fewer Jewish babies die? Hundert cited the strong communal support network, the relative stability of the family, the low rate of Jewish alcoholism, and the system of "kest" through which young couples were hosted by the bride's family in the first years of marriage.

At the close of the 18th century, some 90 percent of Poland's Christian population were peasants living in the countryside, while the Jews lived predominantly in towns. In other words, the Jewish population was essentially urban, and lived in a society that was primarily rural.

Many Jews preferred to live in private towns owned by magnates who protected them, but even in public towns, most taverns and stores were owned by Jews. Hundert questioned the appropriateness of the term "minority" as applied to the Jews, since only 40 to 60 percent of the inhabitants of Poland were of Polish origin. The population was multinational.

Author of the landmark study, The Jews in a Polish Private Town: The Case of Opatow in the Eighteenth Century (John Hopkins, 1992), Hundert cited a few rare bibliographic sources for Polish-Jewish genealogy, including some private-town archives. The message for genealogists? Dogged determination, scholarship and strong linguistic skills can pay off.

With the agility of a stage magician, he closed his lecture by displaying two impressive documents. First, a page from the Warsaw census of 1765, showing a column of Hebrew-style patronymics with no modern surnames in evidence. Second, a census page listing family members of the chassidic giant, the Ba'al Shem Tov.

For experienced researchers, the Polish census of 1765 has acquired the mythical aura of a holy grail. The historian Raphael Mahler examined it and published an analysis before the war. Since then, the census has largely disappeared: only fragments remain, mostly for towns in the east and south-east, but they're very difficult to find. Hundert's determination and superb research skills had paid off once again.

Talmud study on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Later this month, on the 22nd of Kislev, thousands of people around the world will celebrate as they complete studying the second of the six Orders of the Talmud, Mo'ed. The very next day, they will begin learning the third Order of the Talmud, Nashim. And they will continue in this shared learning experience until the entire Talmud is completed on Tuesday, the 20th of Adar I, 5765 (March 1, 2005)! [http://www.dafyomi.co.il/calendars/cal-short.htm]

In the 1920s, Rabbi Meir Shapiro, the Lubliner Rav of Poland, had a ground-breaking idea: to unite Jews around the globe by having each of them study exactly the same text of Talmud on a daily basis. By reading a double-page (daf) a day (yomi), they would complete the Talmud's 2,711 double pages in approximately seven years [http://www.jewish-holiday.com/rosh/talmud.html].

Rabbi Shapiro's vision has caught on. When the 10th Daf Yomi cycle was completed on Sept. 28, 1997, 26,000 people crowded into New York's Madison Square Garden to be linked by satellite with dozens of communities around the world [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk970926/usny.htm]. An estimated 70,000 people were celebrating learning the daily daf for about an hour a day over a span of seven years – before starting over again.

Without a doubt, the best way to learn Talmud is under the guidance of a teacher or with a knowledgeable friend. But there are many online resources that can also help. The premier Daf Yomi site on the Web belongs to the Dafyomi Advancement Forum [http://www.dafyomi.co.il].

This incredible site includes easy-to-follow links to the commentary on that day's Daf Yomi, in addition to hundreds of pages of archives. There are brief biographies of some of the key commentators, charts and question-and-answer sections. Don't miss the calendar section to keep you synchronized with the rest of the world during this, the 11th Daf Yomi Cycle (1998-2005.) Also check out the very best page with links to Daf Yomi resources on the Internet [http://www.dafyomi.co.il/central.htm].

I was intrigued to learn that the Dafyomi Advancement Forum was created by Kollel Iyun Hadaf of Har Nof, Jerusalem where Rabbi Mordecai Kornfeld and other scholars "study the daf in depth in the mornings and work on their computers in the afternoons." [http://www.dafyomi.co.il/kollel/kollel.htm]

The latest Daf Yomi class can be as close as your e-mail box. Several Daf Yomi e-mail lists are available, and they are all free. You can start learning Daf Yomi at any time and can join up to six lists, including Insights to the Daf, Point-by-Point Summary of the Daf and Discuss the Daf with the Kollel [http://www.dafyomi.co.il/subscribe.htm]. Ohr Somayach in Jerusalem offers a Daf Yomi list [http://www.ohr.org.il/web/sub.htm].

If you want to share thoughts about studying Daf Yomi or want to find a local partner, go to Jewish Chicago's Daf Yomi Discussion area [http://www.inservices.com/jewishchicago/moshe/daf.html].

Why do so many people drag themselves out of bed, day in and day out, year after year, to learn the Talmud? Herman Wouk, author of This is My God and The Winds of War, explains why he made the commitment: [http://www.ohr.org.il/web/yomi.htm#Wouk]

"Because by now the Talmud is in my bones. Its elegant and arcane ethical algebra, its soaked-in quintessential Jewishness, its fun, its difficulty, its accumulative virtue all balance against the cost in time and the so-called 'remoteness from reality.' Above and beyond all its other intellectual and cultural values, the Talmud is, for people like us, 'identity,' pure and ever springing."

Refugee compromise essential

By AVI BENLOLO

The debate over Palestinian refugees is one of the central issues in the Middle East peace process. Arab nations including the Palestinian Authority are advocating for these refugees' right of return or their right to due compensation, based on the premise that they lost their homes during the 1948 War of Independence.

Israel, on the other hand, is concerned about the possibility of admitting millions of people into an already tightly condensed region.

The debate is not clear-cut. Some argue that many Palestinians were not driven from Israel, but were advised to leave by neighbouring Arab nations.

The Institute for Palestinian Studies in Beirut found that 68 percent of Palestinians left in 1948 without ever seeing an Israeli soldier. Despite these arguments, many Palestinians admittedly suffered personal losses.

However, in addressing the matter of the Palestinian refugees, negotiators need not gloss over the fact there were also Jewish refugees from Arab lands – specifically, Sephardim who fled to Israel.

I touched upon this issue in my last article in my discussion about the American Sephardi Federation's effort to compile a list of Jewish assets confiscated in Arab countries to aid Israel in offsetting Palestinian refugee compensation claims.

The scope and depth of this debate cannot be captured entirely in this article. But if peace is to be achieved (and I hope it is), it will be necessary for both sides to compromise on the historical facts in order to find a middle ground. Here are several issues that I believe need consideration:

• Jews who left Arab lands were refugees too. They were fleeing after centuries of persecution and living as second-class citizens. According to Joan Peters, author of From Time Immemorial, the belief that Arabs and Jews lived harmoniously prior to 1948 is a myth.

Violent riots in numerous Arab towns and villages ensued throughout the ages – many unrecorded. For example, it came as great surprise to me when I recently learned that my ancestors may have been affected by an 1864 riot in Demnate (Morocco) in which many Jews were reportedly killed.

Like many others, my family eventually immigrated to Israel in the 1950s with bare necessities, leaving significant assets behind. Evidently, they were refugees too.

• Peters contends that what took place in 1948 and immediately thereafter can be viewed as a population exchange. It is believed that about 539,000 Arab refugees left Israel in 1948, while at least the same number of Jews left for Israel from Arab countries.

• While Israel and the Jewish world worked in tandem to absorb thousands of Jewish refugees, neighboring Arab states created refugee camps for the Palestinians. Peters argues that many Palestinians have been living in camps for decades on end as political pawns, because Arab states have been unwilling to absorb and integrate them on humanitarian grounds.

• A quantitative analysis by an independent academic facility needs to be undertaken to determine the true extent of Palestinian and Jewish refugee claims.

The Arab-Jewish refugee debate cannot be resolved solely by the PA and Israel. Many Arab nations are involved in the matter by virtue of the fact that they are advocating for the right of Palestinian return; they are partners in facilitating the peace process, and most tangibly, they were involved in the movement of Jews to Israel.

A marvellous machine

The Book on the Bookshelf*, by Henry Petroski (Random House, $39).

Books
Bernard Baskin

Not long ago, Princeton scholar Robert Darnton – in the face of an encroaching technology – offered up this fervent tribute to this book. "The book has proven to be a marvellous machine – great for packaging information, convenient to thumb through, comfortable to cut up with, superb for storage, and remarkably resistant to damage. It does not need to be upgraded or downloaded, accessed or booted, plugged into circuits or extracted from webs. Its design makes it a delight to the eyes. Its shape makes it a pleasure to hold in the hand. And its handiness has made it the basic tool of learning for thousands of years."

But the book is a physical object that has clout and heft. It has to be looked after, dusted and shelved – and protected from such constant threats as heat, cold, fire, insects and vicious or careless human destroyers of the printed word.

Henry Petroski, chair of the Department of Civil and Environmental Engineering at Duke University, reminds us that books were not always arranged on shelves with their spines outward. On the contrary, through the centuries bookshelves gradually adapted to accommodate various forms of the written word.

Ancient Roman and Greek scrolls were often stored in ingenious containers resembling hatboxes with tags attached to identify them. Readers had to unroll the manuscript as they went along and then had to reroll the scroll before it could be used again.

The most famous library of early days, a "cage of the muses," was in Alexandria, Egypt. The administrator of the library declared that its 700,000 scrolls included practically all that was known to exist and contained almost all of the world's knowledge, hearsay and superstition.

Security at Alexandria and other libraries of the distant past was tight. Armed soldiers were posted inside or out, or both. Laws were stringent, leniency out of the question; scrolls were as rare a commodity at the time as jewels, and in their own way no less valuable.

During the Middle Ages in European monasteries, books were chained to a horizontal shelving unit in order to prevent theft and misuse.

Shelving books vertically became necessary after the invention of printing which resulted in an unending torrent of books. Bookshelves, once fashioned to meet earlier needs, had to be drastically redesigned.

Housing and caring for masses of books are now a problem for such institutions as the British and New York Libraries. This year about 12 million volumes will be moved into the new British Library, and the New York Public Library has to contend with 63 miles of shelving. The Library of Congress adds 300,000 volumes to its collection every year.

Will computerized databases inevitably replace traditional books? As far back as 1962 Marshall McLuhan predicted that the electronic age would drive the printed word into extinction. The next several decades will reveal whether a generation that grew up with computers will eschew the conventional book entirely for the electronic version.

If this does happen, some libraries are likely to scan and digitize their collections and order all new books in compact-disc or other electronic format. Such a scenario would mean plenty of available shelf space as old books in conventional forms are discarded and few new ones acquired.

This unusual book, filled with much out-of-the-way information, as well as digressions on bookselling and book-buying, is enhanced by 96 illustrations and will be of special interest to bibliophiles and those who haunt libraries.

Some of the book's material is technical in nature. But for the most part, it will be of interest even to those who cherish a laptop but find a book more companionable.

Helping out at the bazaar

By ANN SZEDLECKI

Our blue smocks come out again. We wear them only once a year at the annual Hadassah bazaar. The smocks help to identify us as members of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO.

Guest Voices

Our chapter, Massada, is 35 years old. We are selling mostly clothing at the bazaar, and everything is either on the tables or on racks.

At 9 a.m. the doors open and a sea of humanity, prospective customers surge in. They have waited outside since the early hours.

Massada was a chapter with a large membership. We were housewives or career women, bringing up children. We watched them grow, enter high school, enter institutions of higher learning, and go on to their chosen professions.

We attended each other's simchahs and, unfortunately, we shared in each other's sorrows too.

As the years went by, all too quickly, we realized that we could not stay as active as before, mostly, for health reasons. Still, we did the best and carried on with the bazaar. After all, it benefited our beloved State of Israel.

We are flooded with memories of Hadassah Bazaars past, some of them funny ones.

One man brought back a pair of pants, and we refunded the $2 he paid, only to find $20 in the pocket of the pants.

A lady offered $18 for a piece of material we had only asked $8 for. Obviously she did not hear too well. We took the money, but for the sake of public relations we gave her back the $10.

Some people come to the bazaar every year. They make it a family affair, and we see familiar faces.

A few years ago, my daughter, who lives in New Jersey, was so eager to be here for the bazaar, she drove all the way to Toronto with a nine-month-old baby in the back of the car. The day after the bazaar she headed home.

We all bring bags with food – drinks, fruit and noshes to share with everybody – so God forbid, we won't starve.

Our own coats are stored in boxes under the tables. Sometimes some things get sold by mistake, my own coat included.

A few minutes after 9 a.m., and we get mobbed. Everything that was so neat a few minutes earlier, gets turned upside down, but we don't bother straightening up. The next person will probably find something on the bottom of the pile – just the thing they are looking for.

Time goes fast. We don't think about how tired we are. We eat and drink. Some members leave and others arrive.

A few, like myself, stay on until closing. We have to provide transportation for non-drivers, or people who don't drive at night anymore.

The loudspeaker announces the closing time. The unsold things are left behind to be picked up by other charity organizations.

So is this it? Our last participation in the bazaar?

And we remember: Our vivacious, funny Molly, always ready to entertain us. Even with the oxygen tank trailing behind her, she attended our meetings to the end.

Or Frances, wonderful and generous, and always willing to volunteer for tasks that were hard to fill.They are both gone, but not from our fond memories.

Maybe, just maybe, we will be able to do it one more time. Bazaar in the year 2000. That will mark a double chai of our chapter's life.

Millennium part of Jewish heritage, says professor

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is wrong to think of the millennium as only a Christian event, says a professor of political studies at Haifa University.

"The birth of Christianity took place against a backdrop of Judaism, and it is an event that is part of Jewish history," said Gabriel Ben Dor. He was a speaker at the four-part Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Lecture Series held at Holy Blossom Temple.

Jews live in a dual world, said Ben Dor; we are part of the general world and part of Judaism.

"The millennium is not something to ignore. It is part of our heritage.

"We have conquered odds, and we are a stronger, prouder, richer culture than ever [before]. We should have no sense of inferiority. To shy away from the millennium, would be to demonstrate our inferiority to the western world."

It is important to study what has gone on for the past 2,000 years, said Ben Dor, in order to ensure that the future "will be no worse. Only by looking at the past will we be able to understand the present. Rejecting history would be rejecting responsibility. By studying the past, you can make a better future."

Among the lessons we have learned in 2,000 years of history, said Ben Dor, is that there will always be a Diaspora. "We will not have a Zionism that will see every Jew living in Israel. Jews should see the Diaspora as an important part of the Jewish people, and [understand] that the two can give to each other and learn from each other."

Throughout the years, Jews have learned the art of diplomacy in order to survive, he said. Good negotiation "is an essential supplement to power. One should not come at the expense of the other."

Jews have lived in many societies, and in the long run, they have prospered best where there is freedom, tolerance and democracy, said Ben Dor.

Gabriel Ben Dor

"We have a vested interest in the triumph of freedom, liberty and capitalism, and we should ally ourselves with those regimes. If we need to confront others, we should not confront liberal countries. It is worth making concessions to be part of the family."

We have survived for the past 2,000 years, "but just barely. We have been persecuted and butchered, but we have also assimilated, intermarried and have had zero population growth. Jews must rebuild as a nation, in the demographic sense. We will not get there by assimilation and intermarriage."

Judaism is distinguished, he said, by the fusion of the nation and religion, and we should stop trying to separate it. "Judaism will not survive without religion. We must have a strong responsibility [towards] tradition; we must not leave religion out of Judaism."

One lesson we must learn, said Ben Dor, is that Jews will always be different. "We should be proud [of that fact]. Being different means having a longer history and higher standards, and being citizens of Israel."

Israel, however, should not be considered a messianic entity, he said. "It should be cherished, appreciated and valued, but it should not be idolized."

Jews are a small people, and will always be small, but in Israel there are almost five million Jews – the only nation that is growing rapidly, said Ben Dor.

"In a good year, Israel gains about 100,000 Jews a year. In seven or eight years, we will reach the symbolic six million Jews in Israel.

As a community, said Ben Dor, Israel is bound to change. "The haredim are having 10 or 11 children, and secular Israelis are having two, three or four children. When the haredim are a majority in Israel…what kind of country will we have? There is no question the state will survive, be strong and be focused on Jewish identity, but what kind of thought will we see?"

It is a mistake to think that solutions to conflicts can be found by political means, said Ben Dor. People need to dialogue and determine what they agree upon. "They all agree on the importance of having a Jewish state, and everyone has a positive attitude to the state and its authorities.

"They also agree on [the importance of] Jewish values and tradition, and they have a fundamental responsibility for democracy. These things are part and parcel of the Israeli soul. We have to build on these foundations."

Courage

Anat Yahalom. A Heroine's Courage

At 17 I received my parents permission for early draft. While in the military, I took a course in administration and enlisted in the tank division, as my father had.

I requested to serve in the Sinai Desert near the Suez Canal. This was considered to be very risky for women.

During a period of high alert, an order was received to evacuate the women. As the Regiment Commander's Assistant, I volunteered to remain and help the new commanding officer.

On the first day of the Six Day War, October 6, 1973, at 2:15 p.m., I was alone in the office when I heard a roaring sound. Enemy Egyptian planes were bombing our camp. I lay down on the floor ... terrified ... we suffered a direct strike. I was seriously wounded. My legs were severely crushed.

For almost a year I was hospitalized, enduring 15 surgeries and another 8 months of treatment and rehabilitation before even being able to sit in a wheelchair. Today, although my one leg is still paralyzed, with the help of prosthesis and orthopedic shoes, I am able to walk without crutches.

I visit the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv every week for physiotherapy and swimming. It is at Beit Halochem where my husband and 3 children can be together with me and participate in all the excellent programs and activities. It is a place where we feel comfortable, protected and cared for. From the bottom of my heart, I want to thank those who thought of the idea of establishing a place like Beit Halochem for all of us who have suffered injuries and are now disabled.

Women's Campaign Climbs

The UJA Federation Women's Campaign is expected to set a new fundraising record by topping $4.5 million.

Last year's contributors raised $4 million toward the annual campaign total of $40.5 million. The increases are coming from both existing donors and new givers.

Women's Campaign Chair Carole Sterling attributes this year's impressive results to enhanced outreach efforts and a wide range of motivational programming.

"Our volunteers have come up with some wonderfully effective ways of engaging women in the Jewish community who are already committed to UJA Federation, as well as those who are still learning about what we do," says Sterling.

Local mini-bus missions, which offer participants the opportunity to visit community agencies funded by UJA Federation, have become one of Women's Campaign's biggest success stories. The monthly half-day trips have included visits to Jewish Vocational Service, Zareinu, the Bernard Betel Centre and Jews for Judaism, as well as presentations by Jewish Family and Child Service.

For information about the next Women's Campaign Bus Mission, planned for the spring, please call (416) 631-5717.

"The missions have proven to be very empowering for our campaigners," notes Helen Silverstein, who loaded seven women into her mini-van earlier this fall. "It's also a great starting point for newcomers to get to know how UJA Federation fits into the community."

Claudette Edghill brought some of her closest friends along on a mission she helped organize in September. After becoming active in UJA Federation three years ago, Edghill said she wanted participants to share her joy in helping others. "They had such a meaningful experience that some of them came out to campaign on Super Sunday. That's what it's all about," she adds.

But going mobile isn't the only way Women's Campaign is reaching out. A "women's only" poker night and a sushi party were recently held, drawing dozens of supporters of all ages. The programs were successful because they combined learning with fun," explains Sarena Koschitzky, who is co-chairing outreach for Women's Campaign with Alison Himel. "It was great to see so many new faces," adds Himel.

The next Women's Campaign program, featuring world-renowned Judaic scholar and women's rights advocate, Alice Shalvi, will take place on November 22, 7:30 p.m., Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Avenue. For more event information or to purchase tickets, at $18 a person, call (416) 631-5826.

Meeting Reinvigorates Volunteer

Jocelyn Engel feels a deeper desire to work on beahlf of UJA Federation and Jews in need.

For Jocelyn Engel, being in the right place at the right time led to a deeper connection to UJA Federation.

Until this year, Engel, who works as a supply teacher for the Toronto Board of Education, was a regular contributor and an occasional campaigner. But when a friend, who was an active UJA Federation volunteer, invited her to hear first hand how UJA Federation dollars are helping to save Jewish lives as far away as Ethiopia a new spark of interest was ignited.

The pivotal event was a breakfast featuring Micha Feldman, Director of the Jewish Agency's operations in Ethiopia and Mehereta Baruch, an Ethiopian immigrant who described the harrowing journey she and her family made to Israel.

"When I heard the speakers talk about the difference UJA Federation makes to so many lives I felt re-connected to the cause," explains Engel, who brought along her daughter as well. "I felt very proud to share this powerful experience with her. "So I decided to take my involvement even further." The next step was going on a Women's Campaign bus mission where she visited the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living and the Zareinu school for severely challenged children.

"Seeing first hand the incredible work UJA funds in our community allows me to speak from the heart when I ask people to support the campaign," says Engel. "Now everywhere I go I tell people about UJA Federation."

Community Campaign Countdown

The countdown to the final phase of UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 has begun. With the campaign closing in on $30 million, efforts are intensifying to raise the total beyond last year's record $40.5 million by reaching as many donors as possible before the end of the year.

The final push is being headed by a specially appointed team of UJA Federation's best campaigners who have been integral to the success of this fundraising drive so far.

To keep the strong momentum during the Community Campaign Countdown, a number of events have been scheduled, including a dinner reception at the Air Canada Centre preceding Jewish Toronto night, November 30, sponsored by UJA Federation, the Toronto Raptors and The Canadian Jewish News.

Representatives from dozens of communal organizations, many UJA Federation beneficiary agencies, will also be participating in Campaign 2000 telethons throughout November and December.

"We know our community agencies will pitch in," says Shirley Worth, who is co-chairing the Community Campaign Countdown with Igor Korenzvit. "Without the funds raised by UJA Federation year after year, our agencies would not be able to deliver the services on which so many of our community members depend," adds Korenzvit.

Earlier this week, Alla Levy, Director of Jewish Agency operations in the former Soviet Union, provided some inspirational insight about the plight of Jews struggling to emigrate from the FSU to Israel. Funds raised by UJA Federation help support the Jewish Agency's efforts to rescue Jews from unstable regions all over the world. Aliyah from the troubled FSU, especially Russia, has risen by 130% this year, largely due to growing anti-Semitism.

"Too many people are counting on us not to let them down," adds David Engel, who is co-chairing Campaign 2000 with Mel Wolfond. "That's why we need the help of the entire community."

Educators Eager to Learn

It was standing room only last week as more than 1,000 Jewish day school teachers packed the main auditorium of Associated Hebrew School in Thornhill for the opening session of Professional Development Day, sponsored by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE). A full day of lectures, workshops and exhibits focusing on enhancing student literacy followed the opening session. A similar event for supplementary school teachers took place November 4.

Over 12,000 Jewish youngsters attend Greater Toronto Area Jewish day schools. The families of some 3,000 day school students receive UJA Federation tuition subsidies.

BJE Director Dr. Seymour Epstein told the overflowing crowd representing two dozen affiliated schools that "literacy is the power to feel comfortable enough to get up and take a stand. It's one of the most important lessons we can teach our children."

Former BJE Director Rabbi Irwin Witty, the program's keynote speaker, urged educators to double their efforts in cultivating high levels of literacy among students. Witty stressed the importance of setting goals which go beyond the basics in order to make sure their pupils have the tools and ambition to succeed in the 21st century.

"Your challenge is to whet the appetites of your students and develop in them an insatiable intellectual curiosity," Witty stressed.

Two hundred and fifty supplementary school teachers received a lesson in the importance of bringing mitzvot into the classroom at the earlier seminar. Rabbi and author Jeffrey Salkin, who has written extensively on restoring holiness to the classrooms and the every day lives of children, advised educators to "find ways of elevating simple tasks to a holy level."

Salkin also warned that the gap in assimilation trends between Canada and the United States is not as wide as people perceive. "You're catching to up to us," he cautioned.

Birthright Israel's Overwhelming Response

Motivated by excellent odds and a chance to experience Israel for free, Canadian students applied in large numbers to become Birthright Israel's inaugural participants.

Starting in February, 920 participants will be on their way to Ben Gurion Airport for a 10 day trip of a lifetime.

Birthright Israel, the brainchild of philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhart, is offering these organized Israel experiences to North American young people at no cost to participants. The kickoff Canadian trips start February 9, 2000. Future Birthright Israel experiences may involve participation by Jewish Federations.

Last year over 1,800 Canadians participated in a wide range of long and short-term Israel Experience programs.

"Israel is often the bridge between a desire to become more familiar with Jewish life and actually connecting," notes UJA Federation's Chair of Jewish Continuity, Glennie Lindenberg.

Nearly 950 Birthright Israel applicants out of close to 2,700 came from Toronto, followed by Montreal, London and other Ontario communities, Vancouver/Victoria and Winnipeg. Three hundred and twenty five students will be travelling from Toronto and 200 from Montreal. Successful applicants were selected by lottery.

This introductory trip was open to full-time college and university students, who had never before participated in an organized Israel experience trip.

Birthright Israel is being administered in Toronto by Jewish Campus Services, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, and by the Canada-Israel Experience Centre and local campus services across Canada.

Hitler's rise to power viewed as catalyst for the Holocaust

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Adolf Hitler's rise to power in the 1930s was the catalyst which precipitated the Holocaust, Ron Rosenbaum said.

Holocaust Education Week

"I must stress the centrality of Hitler," said Rosenbaum, author of Explaining Hitler: The Search for the Origins of his Evil.

"In that time, Hitler made the difference between persecution and extermination," he told an audience of 700 at Adath Israel Congregation during a Holocaust Education Week lecture.

The Nazi leader is already winning posthumous victories, he said, by being allowed to escape the responsibility of his actions.

People are letting Hitler escape by describing him as a member of a dysfunctional family, or by agreeing to psychoanalytic theories that blame Hitler's father or mother.

It's scary to think of Hitler as a normal person, he said. We want to believe otherwise and distance ourselves from him.

The anti-Semitism of the times should certainly be considered a key factor in Hitler's rise to power.

In the United States, Rosenbaum said, Henry Ford was as anti-Semitic as Hitler. Ford's views were expressed, for example, in a pamphlet he circulated entitled The International Jew.

Hitler worshipped Henry Ford and offered to send storm troopers to America to help Ford win an election, the author said. And Ford financed the Nazi party at a crucial time.

Rosenbaum said he became interested in doing research on Hitler after his father mentioned that his cousin had been rounded up in France and never heard from again.

"All of Hitler's victims are part of my extended family," he said.

Susan Haber, chair, Adath Israel adult education committee, introduced the speaker and he was thanked by Rabbi Stephen Saltzman. Barbara Rush of the Holocaust Education Week committee, and Shelley Parker, Adath Israel president, also spoke.

Holocaust film critiqued at closing program

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The only lesson Life is Beautiful can teach is how not to write a film about the Holocaust, said Prof. Stuart Liebman at the closing program of Holocaust Education Week.

Liebman, chair of the department of Media Studies at the City University of New York, debated the merits of the movie with Prof. Judith Doneson, who teaches Holocaust and film at Washington University.

Life is Beautiful, directed by Roberto Benigni, is a film about a Jewish-Italian waiter sent to a concentration camp, who makes light of the situation by convincing his son that the concentration camp is a game.

Benigni uses a technique called inversion to present the opposite of how things really were during the Holocaust, Liebman said.

Inversion is used in his portrayal of the main character, Guido, Liebman said.

"We know people on last marches didn't march off cockily in high spirits, even for their children, but that's the way it is represented in the film," he said.

Doneson, on the other hand, said she liked the portrayal of Guido, because she is sick of seeing Jews portrayed as weak and powerless.

In most movies, "we see Jews always as victims without responses. That's the person who carried out the Holocaust's version of the Jew," she said.

Liebman argued that the movie was a "grotesquely inaccurate" account of the Holocaust.

He also described Benigni's claim that the movie was a fable as "a way of insulating himself from those who would preserve the letter and spirit of what the Holocaust was."

Doneson attacked the argument that the film trivializes the Holocaust.

"If you say films trivialize, you have to look at the rest of the picture," she said.

Look at the tremendous tourist industry spawned by interest in the Holocaust, she said.

If one argues that film trivializes the Holocaust, one must also examine how television popularizes and trivializes the Holocaust, she said.

She pointed to the NBC mini series Holocaust which she said "was shown with great trepidation for 9½ hours".

Focus on child poverty

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The campaign against child poverty is the focus of two community events planned for later this month.

On Nov. 23 at 6 p.m., there is an interfaith event at Nathan Phillips Square sponsored by the Campaign Against Child Poverty, a coalition from across the political and religious spectrum dedicated to raising the profile of child poverty.

On the agenda are a few songs sung by an interfaith children's chorus, led by Renee Bouthot and Carla Silver; a candlelight vigil and entertainment.

Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman will interrupt the council session and he and other speakers will address the crowd inside council chambers.

On Nov. 24, at 5:30 p.m., there is a ½-hour program at Mel Lastman Square called Children Caring for Children.

Jewish teens will lead readings and songs focusing on Jewish values and on the plight of children living in poverty. There will be a series of readings from biblical sources expressing our obligations and commitments to those living in poverty, intermingled with the sounding of the shofar.

passengers are many Americans. The Israeli carrier says this cuts into its most profitable market, the United States.

El Al has also asked that it be permitted to collect U.S. passengers on its Canadian routes.

Because Ottawa has refused that request, and because Israel allowed the current Air Canada schedule to go on, El Al last week announced that it is no longer financially worthwhile to fly to Montreal.

In order to offset potential losses, the airline's twice-weekly flights to and from Montreal, on Tuesdays and Thursdays, will be discontinued indefinitely as of Jan. 1.

Albert Cohen, El Al's longtime Quebec district manager, conceded that Israel acted before the two countries could solve the dispute. "It's very political," he said.

The move will mean that Montreal travellers will either have to switch to other airlines or fly El Al from Toronto or New York, adding more than an hour travelling time, Cohen said.

He said he doesn't know what will happen to the six El Al employees and an undisclosed number of security staff in Montreal.

"There's nothing definite. It's just a suspension, but we don't know for how long."

Cohen said El Al has developed a large clientele in Montreal over the years.

El Al's three weekly flights to and from Toronto will continue as before, said Stanley Morais, the airline's Canadian director of sales and marketing.

Morais said it's possible that El Al will close its Montreal operations permanently.

He charged Air Canada with "creating a monopoly" on Canadian travel to and from Israel. "It's definitely not a fair competition."

The latest round in this dispute took place at Israel's request on Nov. 9, the day on which a 12-year-old bilateral air agreement between Israel and Canada expired.

Through its embassy in Tel Aviv, Ottawa issued a statement warning that "Israel's refusal to allow Air Canada to continue its daily flight schedule will cause the airline to incur considerable commercial losses.

"To offset such losses, [Canada has] decided proportionately to deny El Al the right to overfly Canada en route to the U.S. if Air Canada's daily flights are cut," the statement warned.

It continued: "The Canadian government's action follows Israel's decision to terminate the 1987 Canada-Israel Air Agreement effective today [Nov. 9]. El Al's right to overfly Canada had been granted under the terms of this agreement, which Canada was ready to continue. If Israel fails to approve Air Canada's daily flights, the Canadian government will consider it necessary to take a proportionate and measured response, by denying overflights."

Since virtually all U.S.-bound El Al flights overfly Canada, Ottawa's denial of its airspace would have added an average 30 minutes to each flight, and would have burned extra fuel.

Israel backed down the next day.

And Ottawa wasn't bluffing. "Our position is that Canada does not intend to take action on overflights as long as Israel does not cancel Air Canada flights," François Lasalle, a Foreign Affairs spokesperson, told The CJN.

Air Canada, he said, had an agreement with Israel for seven weekly flights from April to October 1999.

As well, Air Canada had sold Israel on seven weekly flights through the 1999-2000 season, Lasalle added, even though the bilateral air treaty was to have expired by then.

Israel wanted the number of Air Canada flights scaled back to four in the winter, and retained at seven in the summer, in keeping with previous years. But Air Canada wanted to keep it at seven a week, because it is booked solid through the coming winter season.

Ottawa said it "regrets" that Israel decided to terminate its air treaty with Canada. The treaty spelled out all air travel arrangements between the two countries, including mandatory El Al flights to and from Montreal.

The Canadian Embassy in Israel also warned that reducing Air Canada flights would result in "economic harm" to both countries.

According to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, El Al chair Yosef Ciechanover discussed the issue in a telephone conversation with Pierre Jeanniot, director-general of the Montreal-based International Air Transport Association (IATA).

Ciechanover reportedly said Jeanniot told him that denying air space as a form of commercial pressure is unheard of in the western world.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Q: What issue is virtually ignored for 50 weeks each year and the subject of intense debate for the other two? A: War veterans and Canadian military service in the two world wars.

If it is of any consolation to the veterans, at least the two weeks they are remembered are filled with enough emotion and passion to last about a year!

Every year, the same issues are raised in the House of Commons: reasonable compensation for those who served in the merchant marines; a fitting museum to pay tribute to the contributions and sacrifices of Canadian soldiers; and a Veteran's Affairs policy that adequately cares for our aged soldiers. Each of these three issues has been a source of great agitation in the House – and in our communities as well. The sad part about it is that it need not be so, and some politicians who are close to the issue partly fault the Jewish community.

The two central issues surrounding World War II are what the Nazis tried to do and those who tried to prevent them from doing it. Yet, at every turn, it appears that the victims of the first (i.e., the Jewish community) are at odds with the survivors of the second (namely, veterans groups).

Certainly, that has been the case with respect to the war museum and the promised national Holocaust museum. Earnest politicians are wondering why Jewish leadership does not see veterans groups as natural allies.

Extending Jewish political support to issues central to the veterans' agenda would provide a huge boost in their efforts to prompt government action. Once veterans' issues are addressed, all the obstacles hindering a fitting national Holocaust memorial will have been eliminated.

In the absence of such a strategic alliance, Canada is still without a Holocaust memorial and her soldiers are still without an adequate museum.

Former minister of defence, Barney Danson, who heads the War Museum Advisory Committee is increasingly skeptical there will ever be a new museum. And, the "faint hope clause" could easily refer to the chances of the government underwriting a Holocaust memorial anytime soon.

So another Memorial Day will pass, old soldiers will put away their medals for another year and another opportunity for the Jewish community to advance its agenda in harmonious partnership will have been lost. Another reason to shed a tear on Nov. 11.

Activist urges increase in Yiddish instruction

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Yiddish activist who nurtured the adult Yiddish class at Adath Israel until it became the largest in the Greater Toronto Area, wants some changes made.

Louis Gula thinks every synagogue should draw on its own community and establish a Yiddish class for beginners, including children.

He also wants every parochial school that now teaches Hebrew to devote at least half an hour a day to Yiddish.

"Yiddish is more than a language," said Gula, whose daughter Susan Haber, is chair of beit midrash– adult studies – at Adath Israel. "But if these changes aren't made, Yiddish in Toronto will die."

Gula thinks Adath Israel is enjoying a banner year in attendance, without any outside financial help, because of the interest surrounding the celebration of 1,000 years of Yiddish, and because David Newman is the teacher.

The decision to hold the class in the congregation's board room, and to provide generous refreshments has also helped, he said.

The 10-week course, which costs $18 for Adath Israel members or seniors, and $36 for others, ends Dec. 8, but a new class begins in January.

It has taken six years for Adath Israel to reach its present number of students, who start at about age 40, but are mostly seniors.

Gula has been active in Yiddish education for 12 years, his association with Newman going back to the days at Temple Sinai, where the latter taught a class.

Newman, who is about 80 years old, is a raconteur who has an interesting style as a teacher. He insists on class participation, and asks each student to read out a list of Yiddish words, even if they use phonetic pronunciations.

Newman, who was born in Chmelnik, Poland, was teaching his beloved language to 50 or 60 youngsters in Buchenwald, at age 21. The youths sometimes had to hide under their bunks during class to escape scrutiny of the guards.

Newman took part in a death march from Buchenwald, when the Nazis were caught between the advancing American and Russian armies. He lost his father and three sisters in 1943 at Treblinka.

A court interpreter by day, Newman still finds time to be the chief functionary at Kol Yisrael, a synagogue in the Borochov Centre, and chair of Yiddish Kulture Geselshaft.

One of his students, his son Jack, 53, was born in Landsberg, Germany, where Hitler wrote Mein Kampf. His other child, Gloria, was born in Canada.

Another student in the class is Rabbi Sheldon Korn of Adath Israel.

Newman credits the Shofar, the Congregation's news bulletin, and the backing of its rabbis and cantor, for success of the Yiddish class.

For further information, call Gula at 416-495-0919.

Jewish studies upgraded at Queen's U

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Queen's University in Kingston, Ont., has upgraded its Jewish studies program.

New courses have been or will be added. A new lecture series has been launched. Plans for a symposium on music and Jewish identity, to be held next November, are well in hand.

The first of the new courses, Music and the Arts in Jewish Identity, is currently being taught by Albert Fisher, said the director of the Jewish studies program, Gerald Tulchinsky, a historian. It requires no prior musical training or technical knowledge.

Courses slated for the autumn of 2000 are the History of Polish Jewry, to be given by Lucien Karchmar, and The Sociology of the Jews in North America, to be presented by Morton Weinfeld.

Courses scheduled for 2001 are The Levant from the Late Bronze Age to the Coming of Rome, to be given by Caroline Faulkner, and Jewish Identity in the Traditions of Literature Written in English, by Rosemary Jolly and Paul Stevens.

Still under consideration for the fall of 2000 is Judaism's Encounter With Science. The lecturer will be Aaron Rosenfeld.

The lecture series, entitled Explorations in Modern Jewish History, got underway on Sept. 29 with The Jewish Question in the Enlightenment and the French Revolution, given by James Leith.

Last week, George Sawa lectured on Arabs and Jews: Musical Cousins.

On Nov. 30, James Stayer will deliver a lecture called Martin Luther and Anti-Judaism.

The Expulsion of Jews from Spain will be the subject of David Parker's lecture on Jan. 18.

And on March 7, Geoffrey Smith's topic will be Revisiting American Anti-Semitism in the 1920s and 1930s.

As part of next year's symposium on music and Jewish identity, the Kingston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert of Jewish music, said Tulchinsky.

In an interview from Kingston, Tulchinsky, author of Branching Out: The Transformation of the Canadian Jewish Community, said he is trying to develop a larger range of general-interest Jewish studies courses in the humanities and social science departments.

Until the Jewish studies program was unveiled in 1992, Queen's offered courses in Jewish religious texts and Hebrew in the faculty of theology and the department of religious studies, he explained.

Tulchinsky teaches two courses, one on the Jewish experience in North America and another on the Holocaust.

By his estimate, 500 of Queen's 14,000 students are Jewish.

ANNE FRANK DAY: The first week of November brings Toronto schoolchildren to Amsterdam park as they commemorate Anne Frank Day. Tulip bulbs were planted by students of Deer Park and Brown public schools. Ada Wynston, a hidden child from Amsterdam spoke, as well as Consul General Jehudi Kinar, MPP Michael Bryant, representatives from the Netherlands Consulate, Jewish War Veterans and the Holocaust Education and Remembrance Committee of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Winnipeg mohel looking for a successor

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Dr. Errol Billinkoff, the community's mohel for the past seven years, has given notice of his impending retirement from the field.

By the end of the year, he is hoping that someone else will step forward to fill his surgical gloves.

It's a question of time, Billinkoff said in explaining his desire to give up the community role. It is not that there are so many brit milahs in Winnipeg in a year – there are fewer than 100 baby boys and girls born each year here, he notes – but rather it is a matter of flexibility.

Brit milahs have to be done on the eighth day. Billinkoff has to fit them into his schedule, and he is finding that the responsibility is having an impact on his medical practice and his time with his own young family.

He trained to be a mohel at a program at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. The program, he notes, is no longer being offered.

"I will probably have to train my successor," he says. "Maybe we can have a couple of people share the work."

If no one has stepped forward by the end of the year, Billinkoff says he will continue to serve as the community's mohel until someone else is available.

Governor General's award presented to museum founder

By SHERRY SHEFFMAN
Special to The CJN

SAINT JOHN, N.B. — Marcia Koven, founder of the Saint John Jewish Historical Museum, was presented with the Governor General's Caring Canadian Award by the lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick, Marilyn Trenholme Counsell.

The award, created by former governor general Romeo LeBlanc, is given to a very small and select group of individuals, said Trenholme Counsell.

Koven has devoted many years to the founding and building of the Saint John Jewish Historical Museum into an internationally recognized and award-winning institution.

Trenholme Counsell spoke of how Koven's devotion and dedication to preserving the history of the Saint John Jewish community has contributed to the community as a whole, and to all Canadians.

MC Diane Koven of Ottawa, daughter of the recipient, spoke of the many different volunteer activities with which her mother has been involved.

Elsie Wayne, MP, congratulated Marcia Koven on her achievements.

"When you received this award, you brought honour to us, the Jewish community and to the community of Saint John as well," Senator Erminie Cohen said.

Larry Freemen of Halifax, past president of the Atlantic Jewish Council, brought congratulations to Koven on behalf of the Atlantic Jewish Council.

"I will continue to pay tribute to the people who allowed me to nurture and to let my baby grow. I wanted them to share this tribute," Koven said, "for without their support I would not be here today."

Rabbi Baskin honoured at double celebration

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A return to "form" in today's Reform movement is a welcome development said Rabbi Gunther Plaut in a lecture entitled Can Israel's Prophets Prophesy for Today?

With this Sunday morning breakfast club lecture, Rabbi Plaut concluded his stint as scholar-in-residence during the recent gala weekend honoring Rabbi Bernard Baskin on his 80th birthday and his 50 years in Hamilton. Rabbi Baskin was spiritual leader of Temple Anshe Sholom for 40 years and has been rabbi emeritus here for 10 years.

Reform Judaism, said Rabbi Plaut, is "prophetic Judaism," based on the "substance" of the Haftorah, the Book of Prophets.

Their message, he said, "was basically a religious and moral message: Act rightly, and you will be okay. Act wrongly, and there will be punishment of the worst kind."

North American Reform Judaism, noted Plaut, has gradually abandoned form over the past century.

However, "form and substance must go hand in hand," he declared. And he was happy to see, he said, that Anshe Sholom Congregation, in common with most Reform congregations in Canada, has returned to Shabbat morning services. Although, he observed, that is not true of the Reform movement south of the border.

"I believe we need that spirit today," said Plaut. In today's deterioration of social and moral values, "we need to heed the voice of the nevi'im (prophets)."

The weekend began Friday evening with an erev Shabbat service and a talk by Rabbi Plaut on his newly published book The Price and Privilege of Growing Old.

The highlight of the weekend was a gala dinner where Rabbi Plaut, a long time colleague and family friend of the honouree, delivered a warm and eloquent tribute to Rabbi Baskin. He praised Rabbi Baskin for his distinguished service to his congregation and the Jewish and general community.

Rabbi Baskin, he said, is "a person of learning ... a man who shares the ideals in which I had grown up."

Responding, Rabbi Baskin, whose father was rabbi of a large Orthodox congregation in New York, spoke about his years as a rabbi in Hamilton.

He said his work in the general community has helped foster greater understanding of the Jewish community; there is "a genuine sense of good will and a desire to learn more about Judaism."

Rabbi Baskin also spoke about his family: his wife, Marjory, and her distinguished record of service to the community; his eldest daughter, Judith, head of Judaic studies at New York State University in Albany; his son David, a financial adviser in Toronto and the vice-president of Holy Blossom Temple, and his youngest daughter Susan, a music teacher and lay cantor for her father when he officiates at High Holy Day services in Barrie.

David Baskin served as the evening's MC. Other speakers included Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Temple Anshe Sholom; and David Loewith and Rabbi Mark Biller, both of Beth Jacob Synagogue. Cantor Ruth Slater provided a brief musical interlude with accompaniment by Tom Shilcock.

The congregation has established the Rabbi Bernard Baskin Library Fund in his honour, while Irving Zucker, a local art patron and philanthropist, donated a sculpture by Toronto artist Al Green.

Holocaust education weeks on campuses held across Canada

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Michael Telpner visited Poland and Lithuania last summer, he noticed the grass, trees and flowers growing in former concentration camps.

It was hard to believe these had been the sites of executions and terror, he said.

"It's not such a hard step to imagine it in black and white but when you go there and it's in colour, it's very difficult to imagine. It seems so innocent, like it's anywhere else in the world," he said.

When he was on the Anguish to Hope trip, a Canada-Israel experience program for university-aged people, he also realized for the first time "how quickly the Holocaust happened," he said.

When Telpner, president of the University of Guelph's Jewish Students' Organization, returned to campus he knew he wanted to share what he had learned.

"I'd like other people to get part of the experience I've had, to keep the memory alive," he said.

So Telpner and other executive members of Guelph's Jewish Students' Organization (JSO) co-ordinated a campus presentation to educate people about Kristallnacht and other events of the Holocaust, and to remember Holocaust victims.

Last Tuesday, for seven hours, Guelph students and other members of the community read aloud names of people who had been killed in the Holocaust.

Jews and non-Jews alike stopped to listen, Telpner said, and he was gratified that people were taking notice. "You're getting a message across – a message a lot of these people haven't heard before," he said.

The University of Guelph's memorial service was part of the first Holocaust education week its JSO has held in more than four years, said Telpner.

"One prof said he can't remember the last time this has been done," he said.

Telpner said he felt gratified to have brought the reality of the Holocaust back to people on campus. It "gave them a sense of how real it was," he said.

"This gave a name to a number. It helps [people] see the magnitude of the Holocaust."

Telpner was not the only one raising the awareness of university students and staff about the Holocaust.

During the first two weeks of November, other Jewish student groups across Canada also held memorials as part of their Holocaust education activities.

For 24 hours beginning Monday, Nov. 8, at noon, faculty, staff, chaplains, students and passers-by at the University of Toronto read aloud the names of people who died in the Holocaust.

"The number of people who walked by and stopped to acknowledge it was great," said Michelle Lackie, director of the Centre for Jewish Campus Life at U of T.

The president of the university even participated by reading names just after midnight during this first-ever memorial service at U of T, she said.

At the University of Western Ontario, more than 100 people attended the Jewish Students' Union Kristallnacht ceremony last Wednesday.

Speakers from the London community spoke about the Holocaust, and a glass with the word "hate" written on it was crushed.

"The focus is always to smash out hate," said Arye Berk, director of the Jewish Students' Union at Western.

Last Tuesday, at Wilfred Laurier University, 24 people read aloud the names, birthdays and places of birth of people who perished in the Holocaust.

Laurier's memorial service and Holocaust week were meant to educate the entire campus community, not just Jewish students, said Jeremy Shimkofsky, vice-president of programming at the Waterloo-Laurier Jewish Students Association.

"A lot of people who go to Laurier are from smaller towns. They've heard of the Holocaust, but don't have as great an understanding as people in Toronto would," he said.

Newfoundland winery produces kosher line

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The only certified kosher wines produced at any Canadian winery come from Rodrigues Winery in Newfoundland.

Certified by the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR), Rodrigues wines are all pareve.

Working out of an old cottage that once served as a local hospital, in 1993, the company produced its first shipment of 300 cases for the Newfoundland Liquor Commission.

The production capacity is now more than 28,000 cases annually, and the wine is available throughout Canada and the United States, and in international markets.

The winery at Markland, Nfld., a 45-minute drive from St. John's, was founded by Marie-France and Dr. Hilary Rodrigues. Vinted from hand-picked freshly harvested fruit, the Rodrigueses note that the fruit is grown in "a true pollution free environment of clean soil, clean air and clean water."

Trained in London, England, as a dentist, Rodrigues was first introduced to blueberry wine at a party nine years ago. His interest in wine led to the creation of Markland Cottage Winery, later renamed Rodrigues Winery. Rodrigues had been making wine since his university days.

Currently, Rodrigues Winery makes eight all-natural wildberry and fruit wines: Exotique Wild Blueberry, Wild Dry Blueberry, Wild Partridgeberry (Lingonberry), Wild Barrens Blend, Wild Bakesapple (Cloudberry), Strawberry, Raspberry, and Plum. Their Exotique Wild Bakeapple (Cloudberry) wine was a Silver Medal Award winner at Toronto's Kosherfest '98.

Because Rodrigues makes the wine with frozen berries, the company can be in production 12 months of the year. The berries are free of pesticides and the wines are made without sulphites.

Rodrigues Winery has winery tours, wine tasting and a wine shop open to the public.

Marketing director Larry Stephan says diversification plans are now being implemented as a result of the company's having established a nutraceutical division and its acquisition of a distillery, which is now on site. The nutraceutical division will produce natural preventive health care supplements, he says.

"These developments will allow the company to expand its product lines into natural juices, nutraceuticals, bottled water and specialty liquors/liqueurs."

He adds that along with increasing the export sales, "the company will focus on diversifying its product lines to appeal to a variety of export markets."

Hezbollah suffers losses in recent clashes

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — IDF Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz said Sunday that Hezbollah has recently suffered "a series of failures" in its battles against the Israel Defence Forces and the South Lebanon Army.

About 10 guerrillas were killed in Lebanon in the past week, according to IDF estimations. Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad meanwhile reported five dead in recent clashes.

Early last week, two Islamic Jihad members were killed in a clash with IDF troops operating in co-operation with the air force in the Sujud-Reihan area in the eastern sector of the security zone.

Last Friday, three Hezbollah members were killed in an abortive attempt to take over the Sujud outpost of the SLA.

Shaul Mofaz

According the IDF's Northern Command, no Israeli soldiers were injured in the clashes, while three SLA troops were lightly hurt.

Last Friday, Hezbollah "made a significant effort to take over Sujud, and suffered a stinging defeat" Mofaz told reporters during a visit to an IDF training conference in Ramat Gan yesterday.

He said the events indicated a positive trend in the Northern Command's exertion of power, which reflected "an aim to harm the Hezbollah while diminishing the number of casualties among our forces."

Mofaz estimated that Hezbollah would step up its activities in the near future. He added that the IDF and SLA successes did not mean "that the other side cannot also be successful. We have to maintain a high state of alert."

He reiterated that in the opinion of the IDF, a unilateral withdrawal from South Lebanon holds many risks.

"We are currently preparing for withdrawal by agreement by July 2000," he said. "If an agreement is not reached by then, the situation will be reassessed. The IDF has never stood in the way of any government in Israel [or stopped it] from making a decision. If a decision is made to withdraw unilaterally, we will do our best to provide security."

Israel helps earthquake victims in Turkey

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel has joined the international rescue effort in battling the cold to reach survivors of the second devastating earthquake to strike Turkey in three months.

Last weekend, Israel dispatched a 300-member rescue team to search for survivors. It also sent a medical team to set up a field hospital.

At least 374 died as a result of last Friday's earthquake. Thousands are still missing.

Israel's Foreign Ministry said there were no reports of any missing Israelis.

An Israel Defence Force official, Col. Shalom Ben Aryeh, told Israel Radio over the weekend that Israeli crews working in the city of Duzce had made contact with at least one survivor trapped in the rubble.

"There are dozens of collapsed buildings," Ben Aryeh said.

He said that unlike the Aug. 17 earthquake, when Turkish authorities were criticized for responding slowly, the "Turkish army is helping us immensely."

Despite the earthquake, Prime Minister Ehud Barak planned to take part in a security conference later this week in Istanbul that will bring together members of NATO and the former Warsaw Pact.

GETTING TO KNOW EACH OTHER: Michal Barak, daughter of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, escorted Chelsea Clinton last week to a youth centre in Kfar Saba. The centre treats children from distressed backgrounds. The two young women appear to have developed a friendship. The Week in Israel

Nov. 8

• Disabled Israelis ended a 37-day sit-down strike at the Finance Ministry in Jerusalem after the prime minister and the finance minister agreed to increase their disability allowances over the next two years.

• The Israeli army plans to call up women for reserve duty. Israel Radio reported that the new policy would initially apply to women serving in the air force, intelligence and home front command. Women usually do not serve as reservists, with the exception of soldiers in anti-aircraft units.

Nov. 9

• Israeli and Palestinian security forces thwarted a "chemical terror attack" by Hamas militants that was planned to coincide with the elections last May, according to news reports on Israel Channel 2 television.

• During a news conference in Paris, Prime Minister Ehud Barak said that "there will be no new settlements."

Nov. 10

• Fewer Israelis are getting married and those who do, are waiting longer to tie the knot, according to the latest survey published by the Central Bureau of Statistics. The bureau reported 38,000 couples wed last year; the average age of the grooms was 26 and the brides, 23.

Nov. 11

• The Israeli cabinet approved a withdrawal from another five percent of the West Bank according to the terms of the agreement signed in September in Egypt.

• Turkey, Israel and the United States are planning to hold joint naval exercises before the end of the year. Similar exercises held last year stirred the anger of Arab countries.

Nov. 12

• With U.S. First Lady Hillary Clinton at her side, Suha Arafat, wife of Yasser Arafat, accused Israel of contaminating the air and water supply of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Israel & the Jewish World

Croatia's Jews rebuild their community to 1945, victimizing Jews as well as Serbs.

Only 5,000 Jews survived the calamity, riding out the Ustashe reign of terror in either the Italian-occupied zone or as soldiers in partisan formations.

After the war, several thousand survivors immigrated to Palestine /Israel, though of late, aliyah has been insignificant. When Croatia seceded from the Yugoslavian federation in 1991 and declared independence for the second time, the country, with a population of 4.8 million, was home to 2,500 Jews, a figure which has not since changed and has remained constant since the end of World War II.

So unobtrusive is the Jewish presence that literature published by the Croatian National Tourist Office leaves out Jews in its cursory roundup of national minorities.

From Zagreb, the stolid capital, to Split, the magnificent port on the scenic Dalmatian coast, Jews here are struggling to preserve their identity in the face of seemingly disastrous demographics.

Throughout Croatia – which has yet to fully recover from the post-secessionist war with Serbs and Muslims which claimed the lives of an estimated 20,000 Croatians and caused about $37 billion worth of property damage – the mixed marriage rate has reached a stunning 90 percent.

"This was not a big deal in the former Yugoslavia," said Igor Francetic, a 52-year-old physician and vice-president of Zagreb's Jewish community, the largest in Croatia. Francetic's wife is a Catholic, as are the wives of his associates, Ognjen Kraus, the president, and Dean Friedrich, the secretary-general.

In some places, such as Dubrovnik, all 44 Jews have married out of the faith. And in Zagreb, less than 50 percent of the 40 students at the community's kindergarten are of Jewish origin.

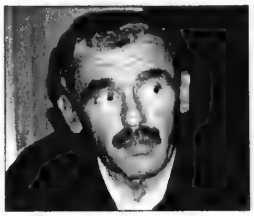
If these statistics are telling, consider this fact. More than half of Croatia's Jews are over the age of 65. Their ancestors arrived here with Roman legions, and when Croatia fell under the sway of the Habsburg Empire, Jews were expelled and then readmitted, in a cycle repeated elsewhere in Europe.

"In cold-blooded terms, this is a shrinking community," conceded Francetic, who considers himself thoroughly secular. But, he hastened to add, "This is not a community that will die."

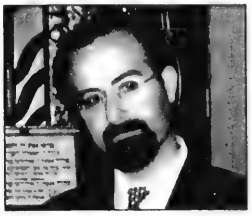
Putting the situation into perspective, Friedrich, 35, observed, "We survived the Shoah, so nothing worse can happen. There is no reason why we can't survive."

Rabbi Kotel Dadon, Croatia's first permanent spiritual leader since the murder of Rabbi Shalom Freiberger in Auschwitz in 1943, agreed to work in Croatia on this assumption.

Hired a year ago in September,



Igor Francetic



Rabbi Kotel Dadon

the personable rabbi, a Sephardi from Jerusalem, has been assigned the daunting task of revitalizing a community that was left in tatters, initially by the violence of the Ustashe and subsequently by the atheism and benign neglect of the Communists.

As Croatia's chief rabbi, Dadon, 32, is in charge of ministering to the needs of congregants in 10 separate communities: Zagreb, Rijeka, Split, Dubrovnik, Cakovec, Slavonski Brod, Osijek, Koprivnica, Daruvar and Virovitica.

Rabbi Dadon, whose salary and budget are partially funded by the American Joint Distribution Committee, is unequivocally committed to furthering Judaism and Jewish culture in Croatia.

"I don't know how long I'll be here," said Rabbi Dadon, the father of two children who speaks fluent English. "It could be two, three years. It depends on the community's reaction. I want to feel I'm needed. I don't want to be paid for sitting in an office. I'm happy being here with them."

Since his arrival, he has compiled a prayer book in Croatian, set up a kosher kitchen and expanded the kindergarten, which is partly subsidized by the municipality.

He also leads services at the city's sole synagogue, located in a crowded room on the ground floor of the community centre on Palmoticeva ulica.(Zagreb's main shul, on Praska ulica, was demolished by the Ustashe, and is now a parking lot.)

In addition, Rabbi Dadon runs Shabbat programs and Hebrew classes, and takes an active interest in the youth music ensemble, the folk dancing troupe, the youth movements and the library (whose collection of 21,000 books is in a variety of languages).

To combat mixed marriages, he has organized forums for Jewish youths from Croatia and neighbouring nations. But their effectiveness is debatable.

Rabbi Dadon, whose family was originally Moroccan, realizes that he is something of an anomaly. "I'm an Orthodox rabbi in a very secular community. I can only succeed by being liberal. I'm not a Chabad guy."

Guided by common sense and flexibility, Rabbi Dadon excludes no one from his roster of programs, even if they are not halachically Jewish.

"I will not poke into people's ethnic origin. I will try to bring opportunities to people to be Jewish. I did not come here to change the world. I just want to educate the Jews."

At present, the calibre of Jewish knowledge in Croatia leaves much to be desired. "We have to explain what kosher is, and what is a mezuzah." Rabbi Dadon is only too happy to fill in the blank spaces.

As he readily acknowledged, the American Joint Distribution Committee plays an integral role here.

Apart from providing a steady supply of kosher food and religious articles, usually dispatched from Israel, the Joint helps keep afloat the Svarc Home for the Aged in Zagreb. The only one of its kind in Croatia, it is also funded by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany. The Croatian government provided a one-time grant of $70,000 several years ago.

Of 80 residents, whose average age is 83, 32 are refugees from the civil war in Bosnia, said the director, Paula Novak, a sociologist by training.

In the early 1990s, with battles raging in the former Yugoslavia, hundreds of Bosnian Jews found refuge in Zagreb. A handful settled in Israel, Canada and the United States. Last spring, when NATO aircraft bombed Serbia, Serbian Jews streamed into Zagreb.

Although Croatia and Serbia have frosty relations, the border remains open, and, as in the past, Croatian Jews can fraternize with fellow Jews from the rest of what was once Yugoslavia.

Sheldon Kirshner visited Croatia last month courtesy of the Croatian National Tourist Office in New York and Lufthansa Airlines.

Next week: Croatia, the Holocaust, property claims and Israel.

Magen David Adom may get Red Cross membership

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

GENEVA — The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) is considering granting membership to Israel's Magen David Adom.

American Red Cross officials urged the inclusion of the Israeli humanitarian organization during an international assembly held in Geneva two weeks ago.

At the meeting, the president of the American Red Cross, Dr. Bernadette Healy, said the Star of David emblem should be recognized by the International Red Cross.

The exclusion of Israel is "a betrayal of the sacred principles of this movement" and "cannot be tolerated any longer," she said.

But swift action does not appear likely. The assembly agreed to establish a working group to deal with the issue and report back to the next assembly in four years.

While Israeli diplomats welcomed the new U.S. initiative, they said they would have preferred a more discreet approach.

This serious problem cannot be changed by a "beat of the drum," one Israeli official said.

Meanwhile, the International Red Cross continues to be plagued by allegations that some of its officials helped high-level Nazis obtain travel documents at the end of World War II. The documents, according to the allegations, enabled such top Nazi figures as Adolf Eichmann and Josef Mengele to evade capture at the war's end.

The Swiss-run ICRC called on researchers at the University of Geneva last week to launch an investigation of the allegations, ICRC spokesperson Urs Boegli told JTA.

He also stated that Israel's continued exclusion from the International Red Cross is "not acceptable to us."

If Israel is included, the red Star of David would join the red cross and red crescent as emblems to protect aid workers in wartime.

Emblems used by Red Cross agencies were established in the 1949 Geneva Conventions on the conduct of war.

The Star of David was excluded by a 22-21 vote at that time.

Since then, Israel's Magen David Adom has worked closely with the Red Cross, but it has only observer status at the meetings of international body.

The Red Cross symbol was originally adopted by Swiss humanitarian leaders in 1863.

The emblem reverses the colors of the Swiss flag, which has a white cross on a red field. Arab groups belonging to the humanitarian movement were later allowed to use a crescent.

מלחמת האוויר ישראל-קנדה:

"אל-על" דורשת מממשלת ישראל להגביל את מספר הטיסות השבועיות של "אייר קנדה" בטענה שהחברה הקנדית "גונבת" המס נוסעים ומביאה אותם מארה"ב לקנדה כדי להטיסם לישראל, במקום שיטוסו באל-על מארה"ב. לפני שכשנה ניסתה "אל על" טריק דומה עם טאוור אייר כדי להגביל את טיסותיה לארץ, אבל תגובתה החריפה של ארה"ב וסגירת נמלי תעופה בפני "אל-על" הביאה לשינוי מהיר. מה הסיפור? בשוק החופשי, אם אזרחי ארה"ב מעדיפים לטוס מערים שונות לטורונטו ומכאן לישראל, במקום לטוס לניו-יורק או ל לוס אנג'לס ומשם לישראל באל-על זו שאלה של מחיר, העדפה אישית וטיב השירות. המעניין הוא, שבעוד שמשרד התחבורה ניסה לעזור לאל-על, משרד התיירות הישראלי מבין היטב שטיסות מלאות של אייר קנדה לישראל מביאות תיירים ולא תרנגולי הודו, והתיירות היא ענף יצוא ענק של ישראל. במקום לנסות ולהילחם ב"אייר קנדה" על ידי הקטנת הטיסות שלה לישראל, דבר שמזכיר את הכלכלה הרוסית בשנות החמישים, שתמשיך אל-אל לשפר את טיב השירות שלה. אם "אל-על" איננה יכולה להתחרות בשוק החופשי – שלא תטוס למקומות שאינם רווחיים עבורה, או שתיצור הסכמים עם חברות בינלאומיות שיביאו לכך שהטיסה באל-אל תשתלם לנוסעי החברות הזרות (כגון ההסכם של אייר קנדה עם יונייטד, לופטהנזה, וחברות אחרות). "אל על" טסה לקנדה שנים רבות לפני ש"אייר קנדה" מימשה את זכותה לטוס לישראל. סיפור טיסותיה של "אייר קנדה" לישראל הוא סיפור הצלחה אדיר- הוא הביא לתחרות בריאה, לשיפור השירות, ואילץ את "אל על" להתחיל להתנהג כמו שמתנהגים בעולם המערבי. הגבלת מספר הטיסות של "אייר קנדה" לישראל איננה התשובה. אבל שיישאר בינינו.

ליד מיטתי מונח ספרו של חנוך לוין "הג'יגולו מקונגו וטיפוסים אחרים". חנוך לוין נפטר לפני חדשים מספר בייסורים גדולים, ולי הוא מביא הנאה גדולה באמנות האבסורד שלו. אז הנה קטע משיר של חנוך לוין:

"מעכת את קיבתי, נערה יפה
בחולפך על פני בריחוב,
ואני גבר שקט ונמעך
עם מבט אפוף אי רטוב.

ומאוד אהבתי אותך, וכבר
רציתי ממך נכדים,
והלכת, והשארת נענוע מכאיב
של נשמת אחוריך הכבדים.

לא יהיו נכדים, נערה יפה,
ולא תהיי לי גם את,
אך הוקם איזן ורחסין ברגע,
וברגע אחד-נכרת.

ומה שיפה בחיים-שחולפים הם,
והזמן מאפיר נערות,
חשבת שאכאב בגללך לנצח –
והינה מכאיבות אחרות".

מי יתן, חנוך, וההנאה הגדולה שאתה מביא לי ולאלפים כמוני, תקטין את ייסוריך, באשר אתה שם.

Vilnius String Quartet delivers stunning performance

By A.S. WEINSTANGEL
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Vilnius String Quartet's recent performance at the Leah Posluns Theatre was one of the highlights of this year's concert season.

Jewish Music Toronto presented the quartet from Lithuania and pianist Golda Wainberg–Tatz in a repeat of their highly acclaimed performance given at the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., a program dedicated entirely to the music of Jewish composers from the Baltic region.

The very first few bars of music quickly reveal why these five musicians are held in such high regard in international artistic circles.

They project a boundless warmth and beauty of sound, unanimity of emotional and stylistic expression, and an uncanny technical mastery of their individual instruments. They have an ease in the handling of even the most treacherous obstacles composers place in their path.

Ervin Schulhoff's Five Pieces for String Quartet, written in 1923, turned out to be the strongest work of the evening. A crafty and inspired work in the best tradition of the turbulent and ground-breaking 1920s, it was an ideal vehicle to showcase the quartet's qualities.

From the leader Audrone Vainiunaite's Spanish-flavored segments in the Alla Tango milonga, and the second violinist Arturas Silale's solos in Alla Serenata, to the true chamber-music-like give and take throughout the work by the violist Girdutis Jakaitis and the violoncellist Augustinas Vasiliauskas, this was a performance of the highest calibre.

The devilishly hard Alla Czeca and Alla Tarantella, played at neck breaking speed, left the audience breathless and on their feet at the end of the work.

Jan Radzynski's Three Hebrew Melodies, written in 1984, is a work hampered by the dichotomy of original Jewish melodies forced into an avant-garde musical environment.

The result is a piece in search of a suitable language, which seems to finally find itself in the Bartokian last movement with very effective Yemenite-like drumming segments.

The second half of the program was dedicated to the sprawling Piano Quintet, Opus 18, by Moise Vainberg, written in 1944. Composed in the style of Dmitri Shostakovitch, this work reaches its heights in the circus-like irreverence of the scherzo movement, and is at its worst when the composer takes himself too seriously in the pompous unisons of the last movement.

While the Radzynski work gave us only an occasional chance to enjoy the artistry and musicianship of pianist Wainberg-Tatz, the Vainberg piece gave her plenty of opportunity to shine.

The Vilnius String Quartet.

Wainberg-Tatz has proven to be an experienced and highly sensitive partner in music making, capable of instantaneous shifts between the most lyrical and brutally powerful, as this uneven work requires.

Hopefully these great artists will appear in Toronto again, and soon.

Jewish Music Toronto's season continues with a special performance by the Toronto Children's Chorus and the Syracuse Children's Choir on Nov. 14 at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue. The program will include the world premiere of a new work by Srul Irving Glick.

Another anticipated event will be the Jeanette Goldhar Memorial Concert, featuring the Canadian Chamber Academy Orchestra, on May 23, 2000, at the Leah Posluns Theatre. For information and tickets call Jerry M. Nesker at 416-221-5521.

A HOME RUN FOR HANK GREENBERG DOC

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is screening a new U.S.-made documentary about Jewish baseball legend Hank Greenberg, best known in Jewish circles for choosing to be in the synagogue instead of the stadium on Yom Kippur during a World Series. (That was in 1934, three decades before Sandy Koufax faced a similar choice.)

The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg, by director Aviva Kempner, features more than 70 interviews with family members, teammates, contemporary sports-writers and fans. Interspersed with these memories and anecdotes is a wealth of material from newsreels, archives and clips from Hollywood movies.

A great slugger who played for the Detroit Tigers, Greenberg came within three homers of breaking Babe Ruth's then-record of 60 home runs. During the era that saw the rise of Adolf Hitler in Germany and much anti-Semitic commotion domestically, Greenberg was often the target of racist catcalls, even of porkchops thrown onto the playing-field. Sometimes the crude remarks came from the dugout of the opposing team.

Such jibes were "a spur to make me do better," he said. "You know, as soon as you struck out, you were not only a bum, but you were a Jewish bum." Greenberg retaliated by hitting balls out of the stadium. The film's Toronto premiere is Nov. 21, 4 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W. 416-324-8600.

Award-winning sculptor goes solo

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Award-winning sculptor George Almassy, known for his devotion to furthering artistic expression among Toronto's Jewish seniors, is about to release his latest series of works.

Although Almassy, 83, has created hundreds of sculptures in his career, the current pieces have the distinction of being his first solo presentation to the public.

"Exhibiting in a group is not for me anymore. I've done that," says the Willowdale artist. "I wanted to bring forward something to the public purely on my own. This gave me the opportunity to create sculptures that capture the moments of Jewish life, both big and small, that speak about our legacy [as a people]."

His first sculptures in three years, the limited edition works feature a range of Jewish imagery. Most notable is his Holocaust tribute, In The Beginning, a Shabbat candleholder that he produced in an edition of 12. Almassy says the silver candleholder symbolizes the triumph of the Jewish will over the destructive acts faced by the nation.

The base of the candelabrum depicts several figurines representing Jewish survivors surrounded by broken fragments of a Star of David but looking in hope towards a new Magen David forming at the top of the holder. The inscription "Remember the Holocaust" runs along the base.

"I think it is important to express more than just how much we endured, but also how much we have persevered to begin again, renew ourselves and create," he says.

Almassy has found inspiration from the period surrounding the birth of Israel. His six-edition porcelain portrait, A Soldier Named Hannah, was based on a picture of a female soldier he saw in an ad for the United Jewish Appeal's 1998 campaign.

He contacted the Canadian Jewish Congress to find out more about the Israeli soldier in the picture and to ask for other photographs that would better capture her likeness.

And looking to figures of the past, he is now completing a tribute piece to commemorate the life of Hannah Senesh, the poet-turned-paratrooper who was captured and executed in Nazi-occupied Hungary.

Jewish history and lore have provided a source of creativity throughout Almassy's career. Working under the professional name E. B. Alexander – a combination of his Jewish name (Eliyahu Ben) and his father's given name, a gesture of tribute to him as an artist at heart, he says – Almassy's sculptures include a portrait of an Ethiopian Jew, as well as If I Were a Rich Man, a figure of Tevya from Fiddler on the Roof.

One of his best-known sculptures is Golda, a portrait woodcarving of Golda Meir. The sculpture was a prize-winner, including being chosen third out of 40 entrants in a 1987 Canadian-American competition.

Almassy's talents and reputation have led to his having patrons across North America. In 1994, a bust of Bill Clinton was commissioned by a Tampa Bay-area chapter of the Young Democrats, and won best of show at the Florida state fair.

Born in Hungary, Almassy learned woodcarving and other crafts when he was young. But when the German occupation began in 1941, he became a forced laborer and was separated from his family, including his new wife Ethel.

Almassy escaped the Nazi concentration camps and spent the war in the guise of a gentile farmer in Austria.

Reunited with his wife after the war, he left Hungary to avoid the Soviet regime. He was sponsored for entry to Canada as a farmhand, by a family he had met in an Austrian detention camp. He later became a pastry chef, drawing on training he had had as a youth, and then went on to own the café and bakery, Gourmet Patisserie, in Toronto for many years, a move that enabled him to explore his artistic passions.

Almassy has shared his creative energies with others. For the last 18 years, he has served as a volunteer instructor at the Baycrest and Wagman centres, teaching woodcarving at least once a week.

Almassy says artistic pursuits have healing properties and provide an excellent source of therapy. He currently has six senior citizens as students. One is recovering from a hand injury and using the program for rehabilitation.

"Art can be an aid to your health and extend your life," he says. "I was under pressure my whole life, but I always made time to carve wood or mold clay. If you have an artistic hobby, you have a release and give yourself a new direction."

In the Beginning* is Almassy's tribute to the triumph of the Jewish will.

India's Jewish community in decline, documentary shows

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Jews in India are a drop in a sea of Hindus and Muslims. At last count, India, with a population of one billion, was home to merely 5,000 Jews.

A minuscule minority in an incredibly diverse country, Jews have led a charmed existence in India, as a forthcoming Vision TV documentary amply illustrates.

Salaam Shalom: The Jews of India, written, directed and produced by Vanessa Laufer, will be broadcast on Tuesday, Nov. 23 at 9 p.m.

Filmed on location in India, Israel, Canada and the United States, this informative and colorful film asks, and answers, a number of relevant questions.

Who are the Jews of India? Where did they originally come from? Are they flourishing?

Like India itself, the Jewish community consists of distinct groups – the Bene Israel, the Cochini, the Baghdadi and the B'nai Menashe.

The first two groups migrated to India via ancient Israel. The Baghdadis are from Iraq, Syria, Yemen and Afghanistan. The B'nai Menashe hail from India's eastern borderlands.

Decades ago, as we learn, the groups had little to do with each other and lived what amounted to segregated lives. But their respective relationships have improved in recent years, as the number of Indian Jews has dwindled.

To a remarkable degree, Jews have blended exceedingly well into Indian society. Many wear Indian clothes, speak the local language, practise similar customs, eat virtually the same food and physically resemble their Hindu, Muslim and Christian neighbours.

The last point is particularly intriguing. Is the physical resemblance the result of intermarriage? Laufer, unfortunately, does not deal with this conundrum.

What comes out clearly, though, is that Indian Jews have never suffered the slings and arrows of persecution. "We've never had a complex about being Jews," says a sari-clad Jewish woman.

From Cochin to Calcutta, Jews have never had to deal with the spectre of anti-Semitism.

"We were treated with respect," says a Baghdadi woman.

"Some of my best friends are Hindus and Muslims," observes another lady.

Even Jews who emigrated have fond memories of India.

Jews left in droves under the impact of Indian independence in 1947 and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948. For the most part, they settled in Israel, Canada, Australia and the United States.

The Indian community in Israel is larger than that in India itself. One moshav, Nevatim, is practically all-Indian. In Toronto, we're told, there is also a significant Indian community.

Sad to say, India's Jewish community is in a parlous state of decline. "It's a dying community" is the mantra most often heard from Jews who still live in India.

Moscow singers to re-unite in Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a far cry from the Moscow Yiddish Theatre in the early 1980s, but two Toronto artists who performed with the Moscow troupe will soon be re-united for the first time.

Miriam Eskin and Uri Tsevi, both originally from Russia, will perform together, along with pianist Nina Shapilsky, at the 22nd Yiddishland Cafe, Sunday, Nov. 21, at the Workmen's Circle hall, 471 Lawrence Ave. W.

The two Russians will sing a collection of Jewish folk songs, under the umbrella title of Let's Do It Together.

"We'll try to recreate the very best of the music we did in Moscow," Eskin said.

The Yiddishland Cafe is run by a group determined to keep the treasures of Yiddish literature and song alive.

Although they received a grant from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in 1996 for 10 evenings, they have carried on since then, encouraged by a turn-out of enthusiastic audiences of all ages.

The cafe has devoted evenings to Canadian Yiddish poets, the poets of Yung-Vilne, New York Yiddish poets, the poetry and songs of Mordecai Gebirtig and Itsik Manger, songs of resistance and struggle, and Yiddish humour.

"We feel it's important to continue this work," said Yiddishland Cafe co-ordinator Henia Reinhartz.

Eskin, who lived in Israel for eight years before coming to Canada in 1997, is now a vocal music teacher in Vaughan. Both she and Tsevi have performed at concerts sponsored by Canadian Yiddish groups, but this is the first time they will be together on the same stage here.

Tsevi was in a group of singers from the Moscow Yiddish Theatre that travelled to Italy, Australia and North America, and appeared at the Leah Posluns Theatre in Toronto in 1985.

For more information, call Reinhartz at 416-787-4634.

CAN'T STOP NOW: Is a dancer's career over when he or she reaches 40? Not necessarily. Eileen Thalenberg's Can't Stop Now documents the Nederlands Dans Theatre, a company of dancers over the age of 40 that includes National Ballet of Canada star Karen Kain (pictured). The show is one of a series of Something Special arts programs created by Adrienne Clarkson. CBC Thursday, Nov. 18 at 9p.m.

Baycrest research could help stroke patients in wheelchairs

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People confined to wheelchairs following a stroke may face a brighter future as a result of research at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, said Dr. David Streiner.

One of their projects involves teaching these patients how to transfer from the wheelchair to a bed, a chair, or the toilet, said Streiner, director of the Kunin Lunenfeld Applied Research Unit (KLARU) at Baycrest.

The effort has been so successful that many of the patients are transferring out of the rehab unit more quickly than they did in the past, Streiner said at a recent Ada Starkman lecture series talk.

The success is based on research showing that following a stroke, patients have tremendous difficulty in unlearning their mistakes, he said. In this project, the stroke patients were taught by Dr. Norm Park in a new way that minimized their mistakes, and thus they learn faster, Streiner said.

Improvement in the stroke patients is a good example of the cooperation that takes place between the centre's Rotman Research Unit, KLARU and the hospital's clinical services, he said.

Listing other advances in KLARU research, Streiner said a link between late onset depression and dementia has been established by Dr. Rob van Reekum.

And the role of the brain's right hemisphere in language processing has been investigated by Dr. Carol Leonard. For example, "some people don't get the punch line in jokes and they can't follow complicated stories," Streiner said, and Leonard is looking at how we can "help in this imbalance."

He also said Dr. Paula Rochon has found that some older women are getting too much cardiac medicine, or not enough, because up to now the only studies available have been done on middle-aged men.

Another project by researcher Barbara Liu has revealed "the sobering news" that new anti-depressants have not reduced the difficulties in elderly patients. "Doctors are changing their medical practices as a result," Streiner said.

In nutrition, Carol Greenwood is investigating the effect of diabetes on brain functioning, and the role of diet in memory.

Program helps deal with cancer

TORONTO — A new program called CancerConnection, provided by the Canadian Cancer Society of Ontario, now offers support for people living with cancer.

"As soon as I heard that the person on the other end of the phone had survived the same cancer, it gave me hope," said a man who had recently been diagnosed with cancer.

"It gave me some control back that I'd lost. It also helped that I was able to talk to him in my own language."

This Ontario-wide peer support program is delivered by telephone. It matches people who have been diagnosed with cancer – and their caregivers – with volunteers who have had a similar cancer experience.

CancerConnection was formed in 1995 as a pilot program to provide emotional peer support to people in Northern Ontario, who did not have access to other programs because they were in isolated areas.

In 1996 the program was expanded to provide support to people with cancer throughout Ontario. It now has access to more than 200 trained volunteers.

CancerConnection is free, as long-distance expenses are covered by the Canadian Cancer Society; it is accessible and confidential, which may be important to someone who is newly diagnosed or lives in a small community.

The information provided by the caller is used only to ensure that the best match is made. Information is recorded in a confidential database that can be accessed only by the CancerConnection co-ordinator.

Since 1995, CancerConnection has helped more than 2,300 people cope with the disease.

Those being served and their volunteers can maintain their support relationship for as long as they agree it is needed – durations have ranged from two or three calls to more than six months.

For some callers, CancerConnection is a first step before venturing to other programs. For others, it is a way to access help they do not have in their own community, or talk to someone who has had the same cancer or treatment. The program has proven highly successful and is growing.

CancerConnection is available to anyone who has cancer, as well as to those who care for cancer patients.

Calls will be returned within 48 hours after the society receives a request to participate in the program.

For more information about CancerConnection, call the program co-ordinator in Ontario, Asha Croggan, at 1-800-263-6750, ext. 611, or contact your local Canadian Cancer Society to enquire about similar programs.

Q. I have a 14-month-old son who switched to milk from formula two months ago. He seems to be quite constipated since that time. Is it possible that milk is constipating?

A. Yes. Milk can be constipating, and babies of this age tend to drink large amounts. Try limiting his milk to one or two bottles or cups per day, and instead encourage other calcium-rich foods like cheese and yogurt.

Q. I have a six-year-old who takes the same two sandwiches to school every day. She only wants either a cheese sandwich or a turkey sandwich. What should I do?

A. Absolutely nothing. First, if she's not bored, there is no reason for you to be. Be thankful that she has chosen two very nutritious choices. You have nothing to worry about.

Q. I have noticed that there are orange juices now on the market that contain calcium. How do they compare to the calcium found in milk?

A. Most of the calcium enriched orange juices emerging in the marketplace are almost identical in calcium content, ounce for ounce, to milk. They are a great non-dairy source of calcium.

A natural wonder of shimmering salt flats

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

DEATH VALLEY — To some, Death Valley is a hideous, sun-baked cauldron best avoided, particularly in summer.

But to others, like myself, it is a fantastic natural wonder of shimmering salt flats, rugged mountain ranges and jagged volcanic rock formations of incredible beauty.

Fond of desert vistas, I had always thought of visiting Death Valley. The opportunity presented itself recently, when the weather there is balmy.

Rather than drive there myself, I opted for a van tour from Las Vegas. We set off at 7:30 a.m., taking route 160 toward Red Rock canyon, where the reclusive entrepreneur, Howard Hughes, built a palatial home in one of its crannies. It was pleasantly cool and dry.

One hour on, we reached the Pahrump Valley, with its scattered homesteads, roadside restaurants and gasoline stations. A two-lane road led us to Death Valley National Park, the largest of its kind in the continental United States. With 3.3 million acres, it was formally established in 1994, incorporating the former Death Valley National Monument, dedicated in 1933.

One hundred and forty miles long and 30 to 60 miles wide, Death Valley National Park is one of the most arid areas of the United States, as I learned at the Visitor Centre in Furnace Creek. On average, 1.6 inches of rain falls here annually, sometimes causing dangerous flash floods.

Death Valley is the lowest point in the Americas, the elevation being 282 feet below sea level. By comparison, the Dead Sea in Israel is 1,292 feet below sea level.

During much of the year, the weather is blazingly hot, well over 100 degrees fahrenheit. In July 1934, the thermometer hit 134 degrees, the highest temperature ever recorded in the U.S. But for several blessed months, from about December to March, daytime highs do not exceed the 60s or 70s.

The topography of Death Valley, which is quite Middle Eastern in appearance, is nothing if not foreboding. Once covered by seas, its geology was formed by upheavals and erosion over millions of decades.

Despite its desolation, Death Valley is alive with hardy vegetation from prickly saltgrass and pickleweed to gnarled mesquite and tamarisk trees. And the wildlife – from ravens to mice – is variegated.

Death Valley is the lowest point in the Americas.

The original inhabitants were Indians, but in the mid-19th century the California goldrush lured European settlers, some of whom died on the trek to the Pacific coast. Subsequently, borax mining, then tourism, attracted visitors.

At the Borax Museum in Furnace Creek Ranch – a resort with restaurants, a general store, tennis courts and a huge palm date plantation – you learn that borax was useful in the manufacture of laundry detergent, hand soap, ceramics and preservatives.

Amid the faded photographs of pioneers and exhibits of mining equipment and minerals, you catch a glimpse of a smiling, dimpled borax pitchman named Ronald Reagan. Long after his acting career had fizzled, and long before he plunged into politics, Reagan was a shill for Borateen, a household product advertised on a since forgotten television series, Death Valley Days.

From Furnace Creek, you should head for Dante's View, which, at 5,475 feet, offers an unrivalled panoramic view of the valley floor. In a word, the view is startling. Hemmed in by the brooding Black Mountains and the implacable Panamint Mountains, the salt plain edges away into the hazy distance. The light of the sun magnifies the pearly whiteness, juxtaposed against the grimy black of the mud flats. Ravens soar over the stillness, silently and majestically.

Highway 190 west leads to another scenic locale, Zabriskie Point, with its kneaded and wrinkled tan/cinnamon hills. Zabriskie Point, named after a mining executive, inspired an Italian movie director, Michelangelo Antonioni. In 1969, his film, Zabriskie Point, was released to a chorus of criticism.

Fortunately, Zabriskie Point is bigger and better than Antonioni's ill-starred movie could ever be. The furrowed hills are breathtakingly beautiful, resembling Israel's Arava or Egypt's Sinai Peninsula.

We move on toward the Furnace Creek Inn, a Spanish hacienda hotel complex whose dreamy exterior is set off by palms, bushes and flowerbeds. Constructed in the 1920s, it overlooks Death Valley's famous salt flats. Once a haunt of Hollywood stars, the hotel attracts well-heeled tourists today.

From there, we proceed to Artist's Drive, a conglomeration of low hills clad in shades of white, yellow, green, tan, brown and black. Then, following a stop at a rock formation shaped like a giant mushroom, we make for the Devil's Golf Course, a vast salt-and-gravel pan which can be seen from Dante's View.

At Badwater, the lowest point of Death Valley, a sign informs us of the chemical composition of the salt flats. Beyond the sign is a tiny pool of water which is bitter to the taste. No wonder this spot is dubbed "bad water."

There is still much more to see – the fabled sand dunes, the ruins of the Harmony Borax Works and Scotty's Castle, but time, unfortunately, has run out.

As the van heads back to the noise and glitter of Las Vegas, I resolve to return to Death Valley, not only to savor the sights I have missed, but to revel in its stark splendor once again.

Young British fan creates Jewish sports Web site

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gareth Anker is intent on shrinking the world of Jewish sports.

The 18-year-old from North London, England, has combined his interest in sports and Judaism, and along with some of his friends, has set up a Web site, www.Jewish sport.com, dedicated to the topic.

Anker, who recently graduated from Jewish Free School, a London Jewish high school, said in a recent telephone interview from his home, that it is common for graduates to work for a year before going on to university.

"I wanted to work at something that interests me, and when my friend thought of this idea, I jumped at the chance to work with him."

The Web site contains pertinent sports information about every country with a substantial Jewish community, such as the United States, Canada, Israel, Ukraine and Russia. "The Ukraine is huge in terms of Jewish soccer players and track and field athletes," said Anker.

He is using the Internet, he said, to bring Jewish people together and to help them become aware of each other. "Many Jews in England don't know that Jews live in Canada. This Web site is going to make the world smaller," he said.

Anker said that he has contacted Eyal Berkovitch and Ronny Rosenthal – Israeli soccer players who played in Scotland – to try and set up a chat.

He plans on polling Web site visitors to determine favorite sports people, teams or sporting events. "There will be no politics on this site; it is strictly sports. I think we're onto something, because since the site opened on Oct. 22, we've had 236 hits."

Three people run the site, and most visitors hear about it through word of mouth, he said. "We've registered with search engines and we've contacted other Web sites to try and establish links," said Anker.

For now, he said, the Web masters are investing their own money into the site, and hope eventually to secure enough advertising to bring in an income. "For now, we hope to break even," said Anker.

HOME RUN: 60 years ago as Hitler invaded Europe, a young Jewish baseball player challenged Babe Ruth's home run record. Hank Greenberg's story is the subject of The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg, a humorous and nostalgic documentary about an extraordinary baseball player who transcended religious prejudice to become an American icon. His accomplishments with the Detroit Tigers rival those of Babe Ruth and Lou Gehrig.

This documentary by Aviva Kempner is being presented by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on Nov. 21, 4 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W. 416-324-8600. See Eye on Arts page 37 for more details.

ספרותנו

חדור השני בצל השואה; אהרון האס (בתרגום עברי), הד ארצי, 1999

אהרון האס, פרופסור לפסיכולוגיה באוניברסיטה של קליפורניה כותב במבוא לספר הזן בילדי ניצולי שואה שאכן הוא פרופסור באוניברסיטה מכובדת, נשוי ואב אך "יותר מכל הריני צאצאה של תקופה קודמת... סיפורי חתקופה ההיא (השואה)... גידלו אותי ועיצבו אותי." האס מספר שמאז ילדותו הוא מתעניין בשואה, אך בשנים האחרונות החל לנסות ולחבין את השפעתה העמוקה של השואה על דור ילדי הניצולים. אין זה הספר הראשון שקראתי בנושא ורוב המסקנות שאליהן הגיע האס בעקבות מחקרו המקיף אינן מהפכניות, אך הספר מעובש וכתוב היטב, יסודי וכן במקרים מסויימים חושף מידע מיוחד במינו. האס אינו נרתע אף מלהיכנס לדיון בשאלות פילוסופיות-תיאולוגיות.

About Food

Here are some tips to turn you into a baking maven:

• There are 3 teaspoons in 1 tablespoon (15 ml).
• There are 8 ounces or 16 tablespoons in a 1-cup measuring cup (250 ml).
• Measure liquids in glass measuring cups and dry ingredients in nested measuring cups.
• Flour should be stirred, then levelled off with the straight edge of a knife. Never "knuck" the cup, or the flour will be compacted, producing dry baked goods!
• For 1 cup of buttermilk, substitute 1 tablespoon vinegar or lemon juice plus milk to equal 1 cup. (Dairy-free substitute: 1 tablespoon vinegar plus soy or rice milk to equal 1 cup.)
• Another substitute for 1 cup of buttermilk or sour milk is ½ cup yogurt blended with ½ cup milk (preferably skim or 1 percent).
• Dairy-free substitutes for milk: orange juice, apple juice, water, coffee, soy or rice milk.
• To replace 1 egg, substitute 2 egg whites (¼ cup whites). For 2 eggs, use 1 egg plus 2 whites. If you substitute whites for all the eggs, results may be rubbery.
• Other egg alternatives: ¼ cup (60 ml) of either mashed banana, tofu, yogurt or low-fat sour cream. (Baked goods may be more dense than those made with eggs.)
• To reduce fat, substitute unsweetened applesauce for up to half (but not all) of the fat.
• Because light margarine contains about 50 percent water, it won't work properly in most baking recipes.
• Substitute ¼ cup melted chocolate chips for each square (1 ounce or 28 grams) semi-sweet/bitter-sweet chocolate.
• Instead of chocolate chips, substitute dried cranberries, cherries, raisins, cut-up dates, prunes or apricots. Adds fibre and flavour without fat!
• Baking powder keeps about a year. To test if it's active, add a half-teaspoon to a half-cup of hot water. If it fizzes, it's fine. If not, it's finished!
• If you keep baking soda in the refrigerator to absorb odors, don't use it for baking!
• Reduce oven temperature by 25 degrees F when using glass or dark baking pans.
• Use an oven thermometer to check the accuracy of the oven's thermostat.
• Place an extra cookie sheet under baking pans to prevent bottoms of baked goods from burning.

Party Planner

These women sure know how to dance

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Let's Dance (416-410-8607) comes to your party, everyone gets up on the dance floor.

"We motivate people of all ages to get up and have a good time," says Lindsay Freedman, who owns the business with Jody Pettle.

The pair, who have been dancing together for eight years and have been in their own business for about two years, lead interactive and line dances at birthday parties, bar/bat mitzvahs, corporate parties and school events.

"Our parties for children ages three and up, in which we do movement to music, are a particular favourite. We may have the kids spread out through the room, act like a particular animal and then freeze, or sometimes we do a little hip hop and have the kids make up dances.

"Boys and girls both enjoy it. They get excited when we dance for them. It's a lot of fun," says Pettle.

If desired, the two-hour parties can be all-inclusive. They will bring the cake and loot bags and help serve lunch and cake.

At a bar or bat mitzvah, Freedman and Pettle lead the crowd throughout the party. "We definitely don't blend in. We wear shiny pants and glittery shirts, and people know we're there.

"We do not put on a show; we dance with the crowd. When people can get up and follow us, they feel more comfortable about dancing. Sometimes we pull people out of their seats. We never force them, but we can see people who really want to dance and are hesitant to get up," says Freedman.

Keeping up with the latest music and dancing is part of their business, they say. "We constantly watch Much Music and we always ask the kids what music they like. We keep right on top of the business. We teach them dances to songs by Brittanie Spears, The Backstreet Boys – everything kids want to hear."

If the bar or bat mitzvah child wants to do something special, they will meet with them before the party to choreograph a dance.

"We can bring the child up on stage to dance; they can do as little or as much as they feel comfortable about," says Pettle.

Let decorators bring out your inner artist

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

A good decorator combines professional integrity and competence with an artist's creativity. Becky Radzinsky and Mira Shimcovitz of Perlit (416-665-4838) and Caroline Keane of Party Props (905-726-8878) offer a wealth of suggestions on working with your decorator to bring out your own artistic side.

Today, a plethora of decorating props and materials can be found. Almost anything you want, in any colour, texture or design, is available or can be imported. And new things, such as decorations and props with the year 2000 theme, are coming out all the time.

Nor are you limited to what's currently on the market, the experts say. A good decorator does research, although if you have time for this yourself, it can be fun. It can lead anywhere, from old library books with copper plate etchings to Web sites for cartoon characters.

There are no mandatory trends or fashions, Radzinsky and Shimcovitz say. Everything goes, from lavish to austere, elaborate to simple. What does still hold true is the desire for something unique, not exactly like the party of a friend, relative or neighbour.

Look for a reliable decorator with a good word-of-mouth reputation. If you've seen someone's work yourself, so much the better.

A table decoration featuring a yarmulke, tallit and stone tablets, designed by Perlit.

And it's a good idea to hire one who knows about other fields, such as interior design.

A good decorator will advise you on things she doesn't do herself. One who doesn't carry tablecloths or dishes but designs centrepieces can suggest linen and tableware to harmonize with her creations. And because she works with everyone, from the MC to the caterer, she can recommend other party professionals.

Book at least three months ahead; six is better, and a year is best. Go to your decorator right after you book the hall, the caterer and the orchestra.

It takes time to research all the possibilities.

As for coming up with the clever idea that's just right for you, that's harder to call. It can take anything from a few inspired minutes to a few days, if someone needs to let the brain percolate.

Don't hesitate to offer your own ideas. Though people are often shy about doing this, your decorator should welcome your input or your kids' inspirations, say for a bar or bat mitzvah.

Express your own ideas

Expressing your own ideas will help you feel good about your artistic side and relieve the stress of event planning. Keane says you can even imagine yourself as a budding artist, mentored by the decorator.

A decorator doesn't just choose designs and colours. She's resourceful, and can make things almost from scratch. And each has a unique style. Ask to see samples; look at her portfolio. Find a decorator who does what you like and need, who will develop your ideas, but come up with new ones too.

One current possibility to look at is the ingenious use of balloons. A Perlit specialty, they can be used to sculpt any object: a rose, for example, where each petal is one balloon. A baby bottle can be sculpted from a balloon. So can a graduate with diploma and mortarboard.

They can be made into even larger shapes, like an arch or tunnel. How about a balloon chupah? And they combine well with other ideas. For a movie fan, movie posters and pictures could line the entrance, with a balloon arch overhead.

Centrepieces use a wealth of materials in many combinations, and Jewish themes are common. For a bar mitzvah boy named Noah, Perlit made Ark centrepieces for the kids' tables, with rainbows over the dance floor and behind the head table.

Among the materials Party Props works with is styrofoam, carved with a hot-wire cutter for a clean cut. For smaller pieces, such as a person's silhouette, the carver uses a cooler wire and works more slowly. Bigger pieces, like letters for a large sign, need a hotter wire and faster work.

Finally, remember that it always feels good to be recognized for your work. If you like what your decorator does, let her know. Decorator and client often become friends.

Thread throught the designer clothing maze

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Way back when, the phrase "kids' fashions" would have evoked a quizzical lift of the eyebrows.

Boys got their clothes grubby or torn; on formal occasions, they were press-ganged into suits. Girls were dressier, emulating mother, longing for the day they'd be grown-up enough for lipstick and high heels.

Sure, kids have always had fads. Back then, though, while the look counted, the label was non-essential.

Today, fads change faster; kids are brand-conscious; and designer proliferation breeds parental confusion.

Lewis Jordan of Jordan's Apparel (416-667-1175), and Susan Young of Amore Children's Boutique (416-654-8117), have watched kids' fashions for years; they now have adult customers who were originally brought in by their parents. Let them help you thread your way through the maze of labels.

Jordan, who specializes in boys' and young men's wear, finds it harder to order nowadays, but welcomes the challenge. Designer labels bring people in, he says, though most of his stock bears the store's label. While he appeals to all budgets, he's noticed high-end articles doing better.

He recalls when parents brought a boy in, and the boy wanted to "get it over with" in a hurry. Usually, a parent first scouts the store, then brings their son in later; but now, boys look over what's available, and ask for things.

Like boys, fewer men now treat dressing up as a painful duty. They're more fashion-aware, under pressure to dress up from peers and wives, and discovering that fashion is fun.

Kids identify with peers

Nor, Jordan adds, is there one single trend anymore. Through labels, kids identify with their peers.

Some like pants that hang over the shoe; others don't. The tendency to school uniforms, besides counteracting deliberate sloppiness or ugliness, bucks designer mania, making it easier for parents to buy.

Amore tries to carry children's wear that moves an adult to say: "I'd wear that if it were my size."

Men and boys decide faster, Young says; most women and girls look at many more items before buying. Dads are coming in more with moms, she adds.

Moms, observes Young, contribute to designer mania when they demand designer baby clothes. On the other hand, there's a trend to combine variety with economy, by buying mix-and-match outfits.

Jordan sees parties, back-to-school time and graduation as fashion focal points.

Young is ordering spring goods now: they're delivered in February. People shop early, before spring break and the season of Pesach, weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs and bridal showers.

Boys' single-breasted three-piece high-vest suits in darker colors are "in", observes Jordan, with black for formal wear. Popular formal labels are Perry Ellis, Jordan, Cooper, and Christian Dior for shirts. For casuals, Hilfiger is losing ground to Nautica and Polo.

For men, Jordan sees a resurgence in single-breasted suits (double-breasted for die-hards), in greys and blue stripes. Tuxedos are doing well.

In outerwear, sport jackets and blazers in microsuede, a fabric with texture like peach skin, are popular. Trench coats and bomber jackets are going strong.

Boys' spring suits, says Young, will be in black, grey and cream-based colours.

Spring is Amore's season for boys' suits, sportswear, dress pants and blazers, with Perry Ellis and Christian Dior shirts ranking high.

Shirts, ties showing more colour

In contrast with suits, both clothiers agree, shirts and ties are showing more colour. Young specifies shirt colours like taupe, mustard, French blue and steel-grey, and says boys will be going for vibrant silk ties.

Girls this spring, Young says, will be into coloured linen skirts, dresses and jackets; the Mimi line from Italy is very popular.

For girls' dresses and suits in innovative designs, Young extols Elvira Valley; for snowsuits and other Canadian outerwear, the Deux Par Deux line.

Young says kids like high-end European designer wear: Jean Bourget and Marèse for girls; Miniman for baby clothes that imitate little boys' clothes; Catamini for detail in weaving, stitching and quilting. These lines have co-ordinating hats, jackets and socks for boys, tights and berets for girls.

Winter outerwear, thinks Young, is mainly for comfort, warmth and staying dry. For infants, though, the fashion element is stronger: there are plenty of good-looking snowsuits, leggings, velour or fleece tops, warm hats, scarves and mitts.

For evening wear, winter cannot usurp the sovereignty of fashion.

The mix of elegant and casual which girls will be wearing much of the time, Young believes, will include double jersey pants, cotton velour tops, dresses with co-ordinating tights, and three-piece outfits with pants, top and vest or sweater.

This is the night the stars come out to play

By JOYCE SINGER D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

With every tick of the clock, we are inching closer to the stroke of midnight, Dec. 31.

We cheerfully got swept up in the media frenzy of millennium mishigas and asked our current crop of stars to share their Y2K party fantasies, while predicting how they will most likely ring in the New Year.

Daniel Richler

Linda Frum

• Songbird Amy Sky chuckles: "My fantasy party would be somewhere warm, with my husband, our parents, my brothers and sisters, and all the children, taking over an entire hotel on some friendly tropical island, with plenty of babysitters in tow. And of course, there'd be lots of good, kosher, vegetarian food!"

The odds of this are "absolutely zero," Sky says, as she will be performing a double bill with Burton Cummings in a concert in Winnipeg. (Not exactly a tropical isle at the best of times!).

"I'll get off the stage about 10, and I'll be with my husband and children as the clock strikes 12 on New Year's Eve."

• Actor Maury Chakin, (A&E's Nero Wolfe) cracks: "I see myself on a private jet to Karachi, Pakistan. I think it would be wild – particularly if the military government was still in power.

"The reality thing…well, I'll probably wind up in Toronto, desperate to find a babysitter on New Year's Eve and questioning whether it would be fun to go to a party. We usually wind up going and it's kind of depressing.

"With the millennium, it's a very special year, but the fact is, it's probably going to be much like any other year…"

• Author and columnist Linda Frum of the National Post says, "My brother has been invited to a party in the Polish countryside, which we are discussing attending. I asked him why we would do this. He said, 'Our forbears were desperate to get out of Poland, and here we are desperate to find a flight in.' And that has a certain symmetry to it.

"But the reality is that we'll probably just have a family dinner here in Toronto. I have always hated New Year's, and this one extra-much! What exactly are we so happy about? The passage of time in and of itself… is a bittersweet fact."

When told that's a melancholy thought, Linda laughed, "Well, I'm Jewish, I've earned my credentials here."

Maury Chakin

• Author and broadcast journalist Daniel Richler teases: "I've got my Y2K citizen's handbook, and I've been hoarding everything from kosher matzah to champagne, anticipating the worst!

"In reality, my wife Jill wants to wake up our little one-year-old girl at midnight, and bring her down to whatever party we're having, just so that later we can tell her the story of whatever she did on the dawn of this new millennium. But she won't remember a thing, so I don't really see the point."

Amy Sky

"Let's make your next occasion the most successful one ever."

Put plenty of thought into booking a hall

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Planning a big party? One of the first things you'll do is hire a hall. Here, Mordohay Altcheh of Pinnacle (416-650-0566) and Susan Zikman Wise of The Luxor (416-635-8967) offer some tips on choosing your hall, and making the best use of its facilities.

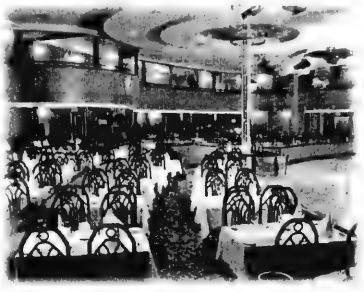
As part of being well organized, book as far ahead as possible: six months, even a year. Since the best locales are in demand, it's the way to be sure you get the one you want.

One of the first things to find out is whether there is a liquor licence. If not, you'll need a Special Occasions Permit.

Decor and ambience count too. Basic considerations of space and cleanliness aside, this isn't totally a matter of taste. How well, for example, will the venue adapt to innovative decoration ideas you might introduce?

Another important factor is acoustics. Sound and light systems are a bonus. Entertainers appreciate a good stage and acoustics, and find it easier to give you their best. Those with speeches to make appreciate good acoustics, too.

Older halls, built before loudspeakers and sound systems were common, often have the best acoustics. On the other hand, many contemporary buildings have good acoustics, too; and for lighting and layout, many newer halls are better.



The Pinnacle

Ask whether there's an in-house caterer. If you like that caterer, you benefit from not having to bring one in; and the larger the event, the more you'll want to minimize your worries about logistics.

A hall with no in-house caterer should be able to recommend someone. On the other hand, you may prefer your own choice of outside caterer, whom you've worked with before. In that case, you accept extra logistic concerns as part of the bargain.

In any case, you'll want a hall that works well with other professionals, like rental companies and light technicians – though they should let you bring in your own people if you prefer, and work with your event co-ordinators.

Indeed, the hall manager's job is not unlike the co-ordinator's.

If the hall does cater, there are other questions to ask. Along with kashruth, you may want to ask about special menus for guests with allergies, or on a meat or dairy-free diet.

Find a venue with different kinds and sizes of room – not necessarily just the right size and ambience for the affair you're planning now. If they give good service for this event, they'll probably do so for another occasion, down the road.

THE LUXOR

In this connection, too, look for a hall with experience in different types and styles of event. Not every venue is equally adaptable.

With new anti-smoking laws coming in, you may want a locale with a cigar lounge or smoking room. Otherwise, accept the fact that periodically, some of your guests will be stepping out for a puff.

Make sure your hall doesn't scrimp on details: they influence how an event flows, and how happy the guests are at the end of the evening.

Check out services like valet parking and hat checking. And do you need a venue with wheelchair access or other disability facilities?

Look for a place that hosts fewer events, but puts more effort into each.

This is better from the hall staff's viewpoint too: if the staff is more attentive to the client, the client is more willing to listen to the staff.

Location is important; for example, closeness to hotels for out-of-town guests. Weigh the advantages of downtown versus suburbia. Suburban locales are usually newer buildings, with ample parking. Downtown parking costs can be heavy, especially if you have to take a taxi from your parking spot.

The other side of the coin is that a downtown venue will be close to other places – say, the Hockey Hall of Fame, if your bar mitzvah boy wants that to be part of his simchah.

Make sure the hall manager gives you plenty of say in your event; but let the hall manager have input too. You, the client, are king; but a good king listens to his advisors.

The hall should delegate a responsible person to be on hand throughout your event. A touchstone for whether you want to work with them might be: do you like the hall person enough to have them at your party?

Perk up your perfect party with a portable bar

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Party industry ideas show no signs of running dry. Among the latest is the portable bar. Leslie Ng of Elixir (416-283-3567) and Marc Newman of Decadent Martini (416-993-1072) have each taken this idea in different, interesting directions.

The portable bar is designed to be more fun, more innovative than a traditional bar, and more sophisticated than a table and coolers full of bottles. Each bar, besides offering the services of professional bartenders, is a visual conversation piece.

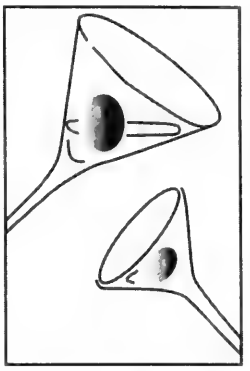
In 1993, soon after earning a nutritional science degree, Ng founded Panic Entertainment for nightclub events. He made Panic a success, and has since opened the Kubo Restaurant. He also started a new business, Elixir, with the idea of offering a portable bar for private events.

Agnes is a double-decker champagne bar mounted on two four-foot acrylic champagne glasses. In the most dimly lit locale, it stands out. Ice stored in the glasses creates a glowing effect when the lights in the bottoms of the glasses are turned on.

Agnes is named for champagne; and there are two other specialty bars, Tina for Martinis, and Rita for Margaritas. Elixir also serves wine, beer, scotch or any other drink clients want, including specialty coffees and juice bars. Elixir will even invent new drinks.

Much of Elixir's work is in venues other than nightclubs. The company does parties, product launches, fundraisers, store openings, corporate events, family celebrations and other gatherings, for 20 guests or 1,200, Ng says.

Ng counts among his clients CIBC, Gap, Holt Renfrew and the Toronto International Film Festival.



Graphic by Edward Dunbar

He says he takes great pride in turning any corporate function into a full-scale party.

This often means creating special drink menus for the occasion, named for employees or work-related themes, he says, noting that on one menu, some drinks were named Heather Wallbanger, Rob's Semi-Virgin Sangria and Ferguson's Frothy Friend.

Up to 10 freelance bartenders can join Ng at his events. Elixir looks after everything from stemware rental to Special Occasion Permits. He says he works closely with caterers. In fact, he calls his service "full catering, minus the food."

Elixir aims to make your event more special, in a way that doesn't cost much more, Ng says. "All you have to do is have a good time."

Marc Newman came to his portable bar business through the restaurant business. He knows every side of this business, having worked for 12 years in jobs ranging from busboy to bartender.

He says a good bartender, besides mixing drinks properly, has certain personal qualities – he's gracious, patient, and a good listener; he has a sense of humour; and he knows when to be gentle, firm or both. This is a vital part of what Newman offers you through Decadent Martini.

If Ng is a Renaissance man of mixed drinks, Newman is a specialist. While he does full bars too, Newman's specialty is Martinis. He has created 150 original recipes.

Newman's Decadent Martini bar is made of gleaming stainless steel, with interesting latticework patterns on the outside. All the shelves are on the inside. The bar has three three-foot sections which can be used to form a unit nine feet straight across, or three sides of an octagon.

Decadent Martini takes care of glassware, ice, garnishes, juices and soft drinks. The service does not include the cost of the alcohol itself, but the company will buy it for clients. Newman always over-purchases, just to be on the safe side, he says. The customer either keeps whatever is left over, or Decadent Martini will return it, he adds.

Decadent Martini will do whatever kind of event clients want, be it a corporate theme party or a family reunion. For up to 40 or 50 guests, he hires one bartender, for anything beyond that, he sends at least two people. Newman says he has had up to seven stations and 10 staff at an event, but with no more than two people at one station.

Book two or three weeks ahead, Newman advises. This gives him time, he says, to consult with you, scout out your venue, and work out the logistics.

A musician or band can make or break a good party

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The difference between hiring a full-time, professional band, and a band made up of part-timers, is like the difference between driving a Rolls Royce and a Volkswagen, says Harvey Seigel, of the Fabulous Harvey Seigel Band and Speak-Easy Jazz Band (782-9202).

"Musicians who play together full time are attuned to each other. Everything moves in a fluid motion just as if it has been choreographed. People who come together just for the evening, cannot achieve the flowing motion," says Seigel, a band leader for 40 years.

Isaac Oziel, leader of Nu-Rhythm Band (905-882-5044) says that the advantage of hiring a band, is that musicians can "change things around on the spot. If you get a request from a Scottish relative, for example, the band can put something together. A disc jockey cannot just pull something out of his case.

"Guests also like to watch a live performance. Even those who may not be dancing, like to stand around and watch the band perform. They are watching an act, rather than just listening to music," says Oziel.

Seigel, whose band plays music that spans from the '20s to contemporary tunes says there is nothing like live music. "Guests can feel a band's excitement."

He says he can build his band depending on the client's needs. "Too much sound is as bad as not having enough sound. We make sure we know how many guests will be at the party, the size of the room, the height of the ceilings, and whether the walls are mirrored. All these things affect the sound.

"The sound also has to vary throughout the evening. During dinner, the band needs to play at dinner level so guests can talk normally," says Seigel.

Oziel says that he relies on input from his client when planning the music for the party, but he is always prepared to change direction. "It is my job to call which tune to play, and when. I watch the crowd and judge its reaction."

Seigel tries to find out as much as he can about the guests before the event "so we can plan the music. We ask questions about people who are giving speeches, so we can play appropriate music while they are speaking. For a Blue Jays fan, for instance, we'll play baseball music. We want guests to feel at home, like we are part of their family.

"We've had brides who have asked us to play only contemporary music, but I tell them they need music for their grandmothers, for their aunts...everyone has to have music."

Book the band as soon as you've booked the hall, says Seigel. "The band is the most important part of the party. Give the guests hamburgers and water, and give them an incredible band, and they'll remember the band.

"A band is in complete control of whether or not your evening is a success. People always remember if they danced and had fun."

Registries: a win-win situation

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Registries take the guesswork out of giving gifts.

"The bride and groom make the selection and let the guests know what they want," says Suzanne Savage, national co-ordinator for gift registries at the Bay (416-861-6080).

It is a win-win situation, says Savage. "The newlyweds get what they need, and the guests save the time and aggravation of finding the perfect gift."

When making their choices, customers are taken through a process, says Savage. "We find out how many guests there will be, how much they might spend on a gift, and how many showers or engagement parties there will be.

"We begin our choice from there, and make sure there is enough selection, so every guest can find something to give."

Barbara Ackerman, owner of The Cook's Place (416-461-5211), a kitchen store located at 488 Danforth Ave., says that when a couple comes to the store – more and more grooms are getting involved in the selection process, she says – staff can help them "start from scratch.

"We ask questions about their lifestyle, such as if they eat a lot of pasta, how important low fat is to them. Or will they do a lot of entertaining? We start from there."

Knowing the size of the kitchen is also important, she says. "We have a set of stainless steel, stackable pots and pans from Italy. They'd be great for a small area."

Knowing the size of the kitchen is also important

It is important for registry consultants to develop a rapport with their clients, says Savage. "We need to ask questions. Will they do business entertaining? Do they have a large extended family? Answers to these questions affect what the couple will choose."

The trend today seems to be more casual, in the kitchen and the rest of the house, says Savage. "Couples are looking for less fine china and more casual dinnerware. Even in bedroom linens, they are choosing jacquard rather than flowery patterns," says Savage.

People who don't need the basics, she says, may choose luggage, vacuum cleaners, radios and televisions – anything at all for the home.

When a couple chooses the gifts, the list is stored on the computer, and things can be added or deleted as needed, says Ackerman. She donates 10 percent of the purchases to the customer's favourite registered charity.

"We are very flexible. We keep the couple updated, and if there happens to be duplications, there is no problem returning gifts."

Savage, who suggests coming in to register about three or four months before the wedding, says that 75 to 80 percent of all brides are now registering for gifts.

"Six years ago, only 39 percent were registering. I think that is because people seem to be busier now. There is not as much time to shop for gifts.

"Registering makes a big different to everyone's lives. Guests can phone, or shop on the Internet, and they know they're giving a gift that is needed and wanted.

"It is especially useful for people who live out of town, or those who don't know the bride and groom that well. It makes everyone's lives easier," says Savage.

Lasting beauty expresses a lasting commitment

BY ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Everyone knows how highly gifts of jewelry are valued. Because we give jewelry to special people on special occasions, buying it is emotionally charged. Someone purchasing a graduation watch or engagement ring may find it hard to be objective about the economics involved.

With a few guidelines, however, it's easier to make a well-considered purchase. George Klein of George Klein Creations (416-730-1755), and Michel Korman of Laurentian Jewellers (416-782-3588), offer some tips to bear in mind.

In choosing a jeweller, urges Korman, go by reputation: choose someone who's been in business for years. And make sure you get genuine crafted work, custom made on the jeweller's bench, Klein advises. Not every jewel merchant is a jeweller.

Fine jewelry lasts almost forever. This durability, plus beauty and rarity, give precious metals and stones intrinsic value: we cherish them, not for use, but esthetic worth. This is the ultimate source of their monetary value, and their worth as status symbols.

Korman points out that with any other item, say a new coat, its monetary value begins to decline the moment you purchase it: it becomes second-hand. Precious metals and stones, in contrast, maintain or increase monetary value in the long run, despite short-term price fluctuations.

Klein believes that the symbol of a lasting commitment should itself be both beautiful and durable. As a craftsman, he finds great pleasure in the creative challenge of custom work. And in the design phase, you the customer have your own role to play in guiding this creativity.

A piece of jewelry, Korman emphasizes, is a blind item: one whose worth you cannot tell just by looking. And Klein, besides warning against machine-stamped, mass-assembled goods, cites hollow goods as an instance of how the untrained eye can be fooled.

Hollow goods are paper-thin, not solid through and through. Though they look fine, they wear out fast, and are so costly to repair that buying them is a false economy (aside from which, they contain less precious metal than genuine goods of similar size).

There is one test the layman can apply: a hollow piece feels light as a feather when you pick it up. This, however, is no substitute for appraisal.

As with real estate, so with jewelry, Korman advises: whether buying or selling, don't go to a jeweller for appraisal. A prospective buyer tends to undervalue a piece, so as to pay less, whereas a seller tends to overvalue it.

For an objective estimate, see a professional appraiser. (If you're having a prospective purchase appraised, of course, the jeweller will want collateral while it's outside his store.)

A jeweller, Klein says, buys precious metal by weight in grams. In his selling price, while weight is one factor, workmanship is equally essential. And as fine custom work takes time, he advises ordering at least two or three weeks ahead.

Custom work begins with design, then continues with the time-consuming stage of a precise wax carving. The wax is then used to make a mold. Then comes an ancient technique, the lost wax process: molten metal poured into the mold melts the wax, pushes it out and replaces it.

Then comes the benchwork, which includes assembling the different parts of the piece, filing away irregularities, and soldering. Only then is your fine custom piece ready for you.

A jeweller, says Klein, has to know precious stones as well as precious metals. The metals are mainly gold and its alloys: white gold (gold and nickel), red or pink gold (gold and copper), and green gold (gold and silver). Some work is also done in platinum and silver.

Oh, and don't confuse "carat" with "karat." A carat is a measure of weight in diamonds, equal to .200 metric grams. A karat is a measure of the purity of gold: 24-karat gold is 100 percent pure, 18-karat 75 percent, etc.

According to Klein, bracelets, necklaces, rings, earrings and pendants are perennially popular gifts. As to stones, he includes tanzanite and emeralds along with diamonds.

For men, and women too now, Korman observes, watches are favourite graduation, Father's Day and Mother's Day gifts. For anniversaries, diamond tennis bracelets are favored, as is the eternity band, a ring with diamonds all around.

For bar and bat mitzvahs, says Korman, watches, rings and silver ID bracelets are still popular. So is the add-a-cube, a bracelet of 14-karat gold letters to spell out initials. Each letter is a cube, and slides onto a chain.

Other jewellers advertising in this supplement are: The Earring Gallery, 905-763-2210; Heart to Find Designs, 905-731-1092; Karats Fine Jewellery, 416-494-6655; Lawrence Toolan Fine Jewellery, 905-771-6803.

All your shopping in one party shop

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

Where can you find row upon row of balloons, napkins, plates and table covers?

At one-stop party shops.

One such store, Party City, carries two types of merchandise: goods for personal events like birthdays or anniversaries, and goods for seasonal events like Halloween or Chanukah.

Often, people planning a party forget the "seemingly insignificant items," like frilled toothpicks to put on fruit platters, said Michael Shneer, president of the Canadian company of Party City (905-771-9438).

To help shoppers, Party City offers free party planning check lists.

Shneer advises that before they head out to a party shop, consumers should know approximately how many guests will be attending their party and what will be served. This information can make a huge difference in a shopper's choice of purchases, he says.

For example, if hot foods will be served, plastic, not paper, plates should be bought.

Shneer also recommends purchasing more items than you need.

"The last thing you want is to run out," he said. "We'll take back anything you don't use."

The advantage of shopping at one-stop party shops is that you can purchase items in large quantities, he said.

Steven Dennis, owner of Dominion Smallwares Inc. (416-665-9526), specializes in party giveaways – items traditionally given out by DJs on the dance floor at bar and bat mitzvahs – such as maracas, costume jewelry, noise makers, sunglasses and inflatable guitars.

On average, parents should expect to spend between $300 and $500 on bar mitzvah giveaways, he said but added that there are variables which must be considered in calculating costs, such as how many children will be attending and the parents' budget.

Glow products, such as glow necklaces, earrings and sticks are probably the number 1 selling item right now, he said

"They've been all the rage at raves for a number of years and now the popularity has spread to the bar mitzvah circuit," he said.

Other one-stop party shops advertising in this supplement are: Balloon Bash, 905-707-8177/78; Dominion Smallwares, 416-665-9526; Kosher and Natural Foods, 416-789-7173; Party Supply Depot, 905-764-5457; Tyme to Party, 905-737-2789; Venture Warehouse Sales Inc., 905-709-4370.

Party consultants are quiet insurance policy

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

Ensuring that matches are on the table for the candle-lighting ceremony.

Finding zayde in the washroom two minutes before he is due to speak.

Making sure the camera is rolling when the speeches begin.

These may seem like simple tasks, but when they are overlooked, they can spoil a party.

Enter the party consultants or event co-ordinators.

These co-ordinators are "a quiet insurance policy that everything flows the way you want it to happen. They provide support and calm reassurance," says Shaindy Cohen Goldstein, who has been an event co-ordinator for six years (416-781-1064).

The co-ordinator is the front-line soldier when emergency strikes, she says.

"You come prepared with your many potions, list of supplies you have, your sewing kit, list of what chemicals remove what stains from what fabrics, your nail polishes and powders. It's a big emergency kit you carry with you," she says.

Because we've all heard the horror stories: The wrong table cloths are delivered; important people don't show up; fuses in the sound system blow; or a bridesmaid appears in a torn or stained dress.

But co-ordinators don't just fix emergencies – they prevent them.

"It's somebody [to be there] so that if there's an emergency, you won't even know it happened," she says.

Even before the big event, the consultant performs a variety of tasks, from helping select musicians, photographers, florists and caterers to finding ways of cutting financial corners.

This is one reason why Karen Garscadden, co-owner of Up & Coming Events (905-886-8148), advises against hiring a consultant just for the night of the party.

If the planner just shows up the night of the party, she probably hasn't taken care of pre-party details, such as confirming that musicians and caterers will show up.

She probably hasn't had time to find out what the family wants for the party, and as a result, she may end up running to the host every time she has a question, in which case, "what's the point in having a party planner?" Garscadden says.

On the positive side, when choosing a venue, there are many sites co-ordinators can suggest that the average individual may not have considered, she says.

Ontario Place, the Docks, the CN Tower, the Ontario Science Centre or different restaurants are a change from the banquet halls or restaurants most people think of when they're considering a venue.

So how do you choose the right party co-ordinator?

Look for a party planner whose personality matches your own, Garscadden recommends.

The planner should not be someone who tries to take over the party, but rather someone "who tries to create a party that's reflective of you, the client," she says.

The co-ordinator also often has to be able to cater to a mixed guest list.

Garscadden approaches this challenge by offering activities throughout the night to appeal to everyone.

For kids, she plans games in the foyer, like Black Jack or Wheel of Fortune.

Or she will have the technology available for kids to make their own rock videos or talk in a speakers' corner. Sometimes, she also plans for walk-around performers like balloon artists.

She also plans parts of the evening geared to adults.

As for how far in advance a person should book a consultant, Garscadden says some people book three weeks in advance, some book three months in advance.

She could not give an exact time, but warned that it is often a bad idea to book a themed party too far in advance because trends change and what's hot today may be passé tomorrow.

While fees vary, Garscadden says consultants generally work for a flat rate.

For people working on a tight budget, a good consultant can help find ways to cut costs without spoiling the look of the party, she says.

Capturing your party on film ensures your event's longevity

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Only a video can capture your party in its real form says videographer Richard Saunders, owner of Redstone Pictures (416-256-4666).

"A video catches such things as the important parts of a speech and the crowd's reaction. There is no interpretation – this is what happened.

"A photograph, on the other hand, shows you who spoke. It can also be made into a portrait. Videos and photographs serve two different functions," he says.

Abe Salzman

According to Abe Salzman of Video Affairs Corporation (905-889-0909), videos are important because "you have your entire event to view at any time, show it to people that could not attend, and pass it down to future generations.

"I wish that I had a video of my bar mitzvah to show my children. I no longer have grandparents; it would be wonderful to see them dancing and having a good time," Salzman says.

Saunders advises people against using an amateur videographer at their function. "Hosts need someone dedicated to getting the party on tape. A guest is involved in the party, and not focussed on capturing it on tape."

Professionals, he says, come with expertise and state-of-the-art equipment. "The speeches will not have room noises, pictures will be sharp, and the videographer will not run out of batteries, so full coverage is guaranteed."

A tripod, he says, ensures that the picture is steady and solid.

The latest technology, says Salzman, includes digital cameras and digital, non-linear editing.

"With this equipment, there is virtually no loss in quality from the master digital camera footage to your master digital edited tape. You will see a more detailed, clearer picture and hear improved audio quality even on your VHS copy. The digital quality will be unbelievable when you watch it in the future on a digital television."

Saunders, who just put in his third non-linear editing suite, says that videographers used to put a tape into a machine and edit from one tape onto another. "The parallel to this is the typewriter. If there was a mistake, you had to start over.

"Non-linear editing is like the word processor. You can take any picture or sound and alter it in any way. A perfect video can be made while it is still on the hard drive. You can replace one shot of a bride with another, or fix a speech – the sky is the limit."

Another advantage of the non-linear system, he says, is that there are no copies. "Everyone gets a first-generation master. Every video is of the same quality."

At the party, a videographer with the latest equipment is much less obtrusive, says Saunders. "A digital camera is very sensitive, and so requires less light than older models. As well, the camera is lighter and more power efficient. There is no need for big lights, wires on the floor or large tripods. The videographer does not get in the guests' way."

Salzman says that a videographer should be able to work within most budgets. "A basic videotape is a fully edited version of exactly what happened that day. Higher packages could include growing up pictures, titles, special effects such as slow motion and page turns, and music or animation. The ending could include a several minute recap of the video."

Hosts should ensure that they meet the videographer before making a choice, says Saunders. "The videographer and the client must get along. We are filming things that are very dear to people, and hosts need someone who understands what they want.

"A professional videographer will ask about the size of the party, whether there are grandparents, and if there are any divorces in the family. Professionals will also know the layout of most party rooms, so there will be no surprises when he gets there.

"He should know where the entrances and exits are, where the head table will be situated in relation to the band, and the height of the centrepieces. Knowing all this, makes a huge difference in the quality of the tape," says Saunders.

Before choosing a videographer, says Salzman, insist on seeing a copy of the complete event, not a demo. "People will not see the mistakes in a demo because only the best parts were chosen.

"You must also feel comfortable that the videographer enjoys his work enough that he will go out of his way to capture everything creatively and tastefully," he says.

A caterer does more than serve food

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Providing food and serving staff is only one part of a caterer's function says Miriam Myerowitz, owner of Miriam's Table (416-633-6554).

Myerowitz, the exclusive caterer at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, who also does private parties, says that her company offers a complete catering needs program. "If clients desire, they can leave everything in our hands, such as hiring the florist, videographer, disc jockey and decorations person. We can even keep track of the reply cards."

Myerowitz says she started her full-affair service about 25 years ago in Calgary when an out-of-country client wanted everything done for her. "She gave me her colour scheme, and we took it from there."

Craig Gruzd, catering manager at the Sephardic Kehila Centre (905-669-7654), says he has an in-house decorator who can theme the event "from the parking lot to the cocktail lounge to the banquet hall."

He has done a tennis themed party, in which the dance floor was taped to look like a tennis court. "There was a 15-foot-high tennis court with large racquets on either side, and the head table had spectators behind it. The dessert was shaped like a racquet with mango ice cream as the tennis ball."

When clients come to see her at Beth David's newly renovated banquet facilities, Myerowitz shows them a 12-minute video outlining her services. "They view the table settings, linens and china, and even see the chef working in the kitchen. It really shows them what we're all about."

Budget is a large concern when planning a function, says Myerowitz, and she makes sure that there are "no surprises. We keep track of exactly what everything costs, right down to the tablecloths, and we can easily make a beautiful party on a higher or lower end budget."

Miriam's Table is the exclusive caterer at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

Clients choose whether they want a buffet or sit-down affair, depending how elegant or casual they want the party to be.

"They can have French service with two serving staff working together at the tables, or family service where every table has a mini-buffet. This is a happy medium between the formality of French service and the more informal buffet.

"As well, clients can choose plate service, in which the plate is made up in the kitchen and served to the guests. Again, this is less than French service."

Menus are much lighter than five years ago, says Myerowitz. "Forget those heavy meals. I've had clients serving sea bass teriyaki, Oriental salmon and chicken verte – a French recipe done in green salsa – or herbed, grilled chicken breast done in mango chutney.

"We can also serve vegan, macrobiotic, vegetarian – whatever the client desires. We always make more than the client requests, because other guests see the dish and want to try it.

"A lot of guests have special health needs, and in order to accommodate them, the head of the serving staff spends time with the cook during the week so she knows exactly what is in the food. She can answer any food-related question."

Gruzd, who works with banquet manager Joe Boussidan, says that at the Kehila Centre, there is a chef from Sweden, a South African chef, and a Moroccan chef who caters to Moroccan tastes.

"We serve a variety of food, from the basic to the more exciting, such as Mongolian fire chicken done in Cajun spices. The main course at a vegetarian meal could be chick-pea ragout.

"We do nut-free, wheat-free or egg-free dishes. Customized catering is a large part of our business," says Gruzd

Choosing photographer not a snap!

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

The photos taken at your special occasion should be of the finest quality.

When the music is faded memory and the menu long forgotten, you'll still have those snapshots and portraits to remind you why this day was different from every other.

Accordingly, you'll be choosing your photographer with care.

Experienced professionals Sam Sciarrino of Horvath Photography (416-487-3443), and Paul Laszlo of Twins Photography (905-660-7385), offer some pointers on making this choice.

Some of the qualities you want, such as integrity, expertise and experience, you seek in any specialist. Likewise love of one's work: the best professional is one who makes their work a vocation, not just a job.

They don't let personality clashes impede their work. They know how to bridge generation gaps. They have good rapport with their own staff, as well as the other professionals working at a party. And an experienced professional who has worked with many others, can refer you to the best ones.

Respect recommendations from friends and relatives: both Sciarrino and Laszlo ascribe most of their business to referrals. Laszlo has photographed as many as three or four members of the same family on different occasions.

Sciarrino places great importance on the first thing you'll notice about a photographer's work: its style. Everyone's approach and technique is individual; and ultimately, finding the style that speaks to you is a matter of the heart.

On the other hand, Sciarrino points out, a paid professional works primarily for you, the client. Only secondarily are their photos a testimony to their own talent.

As to what's "in" now, Sciarrino observes that black and white is still popular, though not for everything. Casual photographs, posed but not prim, are more popular than candid shots — though these too have their place, for their humour and revealing quality.

Come to the studio and see the albums and folios, insists Laszlo, who won't book anyone or quote prices on the phone where you can't see what you're buying. The albums and folios are there to show you the work the photographer is proudest of.

To be thorough, look at a complete set of proofs for one occasion, even though this can mean up to 300: your photographer is important enough to spend a few hours on. Check out his equipment, too. Laszlo considers equipment important enough to get expert advice on.

If Laszlo were choosing a photographer, he'd book six to 12 months ahead.

Sciarrino would go as far as two years if your event is at a peak time.

After that first meeting, Sciarrino advises, plan a later meeting to discuss the preliminary schedule; meet again once the schedule is confirmed; then confer a few days before the event, to attend to details. Meanwhile, the photographer will stay in touch with the other professionals at your party.

A small studio may give you more personal attention, suggests Sciarrino.

Your celebration is unique; nothing about it should be mass-produced.

Someone who limits engagements to one or two a day can give you more time and energy than someone who tries to squeeze in as many clients as they can.

Both Laszlo and Sciarrino see working with a party professional as a two-way street. To give you their best, keep them informed of anything that affects their work, such as a change of venue, which would entail changes in lighting and layout. (If they don't know your venue, they'll scout it out in advance.)

Both photographers also stress the importance of reliability in logistics, and providing for the unexpected. Backup film and batteries, for example, can spell the difference between the success and failure of an occasion.

A good party photographer, besides taking good pictures, relates well to your guests, and usually stays for the whole event. They won't push people to be photographed, says Laszlo, though they can gently encourage them. This can be important if, say, the bar or bat mitzvah kid is shy.

A good photographer can do fine work on a modest budget. Pay close attention to exactly what you get in packages; and remember that you get what you pay for.

Lights...Digital Camera...Action!

If you and your children have been to a Bar or Bat Mitzvah in Toronto over the past ten years, played in a corporate golf tournament or attended a gala fund raiser for any number of charitable causes, you've probably had your picture digitally captured and superimposed onto a magazine cover by Irv Nadel. Whatever the theme of your simcha or special event, whether it's sports, the movies or your favourite hobby, whether it's being held at the Hockey Hall of Fame, the Atlantis Nite Club, the Four Seasons Hotel or at one of Le Parc's grand ballrooms, Irv and his company, M&A Photovideo Inc., have been there many times. Using the latest in digital imaging technologies, they will custom design a graphic layout, complete with logos, text and pictures, that reflects the theme of your special event. Whether it's a birthday party for fifty children, a black tie affair with five hundred guests or a trade show with five thousand attendees, by the end of the night everyone goes home with a unique and innovative photo keepsake that adds value to the event long after the party is over.

The digital event system includes a high- end Kodak digital camera and a specialized Kodak printer running with a laptop computer that uses a customized Kodak PC Event software package. One of these systems alone can easily produce over two hundred 5" x 7" photographs in the course of a normal evening affair lasting four to five hours. Some of the other products they produce include trading cards, backstage passes, ID tags and 8" x 10" posters, all presented in a variety of attractive stand-up acrylic frames or folders. They are even capable of producing CD covers, photo mugs, T-shirts and mousepads! With seven of these systems available and an equal number of specially trained event crews, they are often performing their magic at six or seven parties every Saturday and Sunday night throughout the year. During the week it's golf tournaments, trade shows, award dinners, fund raisers, graduations, proms, camps and sporting events. At a typical evening affair the system is set up in the ballroom or in the cocktail reception area. As the guests arrive, they are politely requested to pose for the camera, either alone, as couples, or in groups. Once your picture has been taken, the image is transferred from the camera to the computer, where the operator approves it and immediately begins to process the pictures. Quite often, up to a hundred guests can be photographed before the dinner begins. The shooting and processing goes on throughout the party and by the time the main course is over, the completed pictures are arranged on a display table for the guests to pick up as they leave. At the 1999 Thornlea Secondary School Prom, 450 students and teachers were amazed to go home with their special photos the same evening and every year at the annual Mel Lastman Charity Golf Tournament, over 600 golfers receive a personalized photo bag tag which is waiting for them on their dinner tables before the round of golf is over. The Oakdale Golf & Country Club recently held a 70's Swing Dance Night for their members. The gift that night was a complimentary CD compilation of 70's hits that featured each guest's picture on the inside cover of the CD.

After doing this for ten years, Irv still hears the same gratifying comments at every event, what a great idea and isn't it amazing what computers can do today? Not only do the guests go home with a very special souvenir, but they are treated to an entertainment spectacle, as many guests will stand around the computer to be dazzled by the speed of the imaging process and to marvel at the outstanding quality of the digital photography. M&A Photovideo Inc. often gets two or three calls on the Monday following an event from guests inquiring about their own upcoming party, Nadel says, and this is how the business has grown, mostly by word of mouth from satisfied customers! They also receive many referrals from a number of event planners and co-ordinators in the Toronto area. Their corporate client list has become so extensive that they now have trained operators with their own systems in Montreal, Calgary, Ottawa, Edmonton and Vancouver and several in the United States, as well. They recently co-ordinated an event in Las Vegas on behalf of the American Ski Company, owners of several high profile resorts throughout the U.S.

At weddings, M&A offers personalized instant digital thank-you cards, group photos and Wedding Bell magazine covers featuring the bride and groom as well as the guests. They also can provide a digital/audio CD visual presentation of the day's events and/or a life-story of the bride and groom including historical family photos. M&A also has a number of professional portrait photographers on staff to help you with your most special day.

The newest innovation being offered this year by M&A Photovideo is their exclusive Blue Screen "Chroma-merge" Technology. This system has the subject being photographed in front of a solid coloured screen. The image is then lifted out of the screen and superimposed into any other scene. Imagine being photographed at the Beth Emeth Synagogue and then seeing yourself in front of the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem or standing in the ring with a WWF Superstar. There is no limit to where you can go with your imagination using this technology. One of their recent Bar Mitzvah boys had himself pictured with Pamela Anderson on the cover of TV Guide and another future NHL'er was featured facing off at centre ice in Maple Leaf Gardens. M&A is starting to get calls about this year's New Year's Eve Millennium parties, so call soon to make a reservation.

The staff at M&A Photovideo has always believed in the personal touch and makes a point of being involved in every project. If you are interested in learning more about M&A Photovideo Inc., Kodak PC Event Digital Imaging Systems and how you might benefit by using them for your own function... no matter how large the party or the location of the event.....call Irv, Janet, Andre or Al at (416) 362-6902 or e-mail them at info@specialevent.net. For a personal demonstration, Irv or one of his associates will be pleased to visit and discuss the details, and costs, in the comfort of your own home or you can visit with him in M&A's 3rd floor digital special event showroom located at 432 Queen Street East in downtown Toronto. Full details regarding M&A Photovideo Inc. and it's services can be found by looking us up at our convenient and easily accessible website at www.mandaphotovideo.com

Beatty Cohan

Elliot Cohan

Contemplating marriage? A new book by a Canadian-born psychotherapist and her husband can serve as a practical reality check.

For Better, For Worse, Forever: 10 Steps for Building a Lasting Relationship with the Man You Love (Chandler House Press) is an easy read, with relatively large print and 10 clearly defined chapters, each ending with a brief summary and list of questions for the reader.

The book walks you through 10 "key ingredients" to consider before you make a long-term commitment.

"Certainly love is not enough," said author Beatty Cohan, 50, in a telephone interview from her office in Providence, R.I., where she has a psychotherapy and sex therapy practice. She has also counselled callers on radio and television programs.

Her husband Elliot, 64, a counsellor and actor, has a master's degree in psychology.

An alumna of McGill University, Beatty is a native of Winnipeg and a former Manitoba tennis champion. Her mother, Edith Sair, taught at Winnipeg's Talmud Torah, and her late uncle, Maurice Lucow, was editor of The Canadian Jewish News through the 1980s.

The Cohans, now married for 13 years, met in an elevator while attending a UJA conference. Elliot was then executive director of the Jewish Federation of Rhode Island. Beatty, a social worker with post-graduate training in family therapy and sexual dysfunction, was executive director of Jewish Family Service in Calgary. Both were divorced.

Did they follow their own advice? For the most part, yes, although Beatty thinks they didn't pay sufficient attention to second-marriage issues, which loomed larger for her than she anticipated. Good communication skills enabled them to work through the difficulties, she noted.

"If all couples had the kind of marriage we have, I'd probably be out of business."

But good marriages don't just happen, even with "the right person," she said. "The biggest mistake couples make is they tend to forget about the couple. You need to tend to the couple like you tend to a living plant."

Communication and problem solving – not sex or money – are the most important ingredients in a successful relationship, Beatty believes.

And communication is not just about talking, she explained. "It's being able to express the full gamut of emotion – anger, disappointment, frustration, fear, pain – and doing it well... When people are dating, they want to stay away from conflict. That's a real problem."

Step 1, according to the Cohans, is to look at your partner's family history. A dysfunctional background, however, doesn't necessarily doom a relationship.

"Your partner does need to take steps to address and resolve whatever is getting in the way," Beatty said. If he doesn't want to talk about it, he's a very poor bet, she added.

Other chapters address skeletons in the closet, sex and intimacy, and past love relationships. Included are tips on recognizing alcoholism, depression and anxiety, as well as traits that facilitate communication.

The advice in the book – its title notwithstanding – applies equally to men and women in both gay and straight relationships, Beatty said. The title was recommended because it was believed the book would appeal to women more than men.

In the authors' experience, however – having run seminars for some 400 men and women under the title Compatibility Consultants – that is not the case.

Knowledge about relationships is not necessarily related to education, income or socio-economic background either, she noted.

"It's pretty scary that in our personal relationships we're so far behind where we are technologically."

Plenty of choice in tuxedo styles

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

A sea of black and white tuxedos. That's how we often visualize a crowd of men at a formal occasion.

But there are many alternatives to the traditional tuxedo, says Gino Cucchi, owner of Gino Men's, Boy's & Ladies' Fashion (416- 654-8710), which is located at 1294 St. Clair Ave. W.

For a change, why not wear a navy blue, or dark green suit, he says.

"Nowadays, there is lots to choose from – it's not like yesterday when there was just black, blue or brown."

Or how about a trendier look?

Three buttons on the tuxedo jacket as opposed to one makes for "a new, modern tuxedo," he says.

While loose-fitting pants used to be in vogue, the style now is to wear pants with a tighter cut that is tailored to fit your size, Cucchi says.

Jeffrey Skurka, president of Classica Imports (416-785-8146), a clothing store and importing distributor for men's casual and formal wear at 229 Bridgeland Ave. near the 401 and Dufferin, says that pants with no pleats are also in style, but he recommends buying a classic style tuxedo instead of a trendier one.

Skurka advises against renting tuxedos because the majority have been altered several times, washed over and over again and are made with an inferior mix of fabrics.

His store does not rent tuxedos, but sells them for between $650 and $850.

He suggests that men buy suits made with year-round fabrics and that they wear shoes formal enough to match the outfit.

Often, he says, "they don't wear a formal shoe, they wear their every-day shoes and it kills the outfit."

He recommends buying a tuxedo two to three months in advance of the special event.

Mandell just keeps on growing

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

The Mandell Entertainment Group has undergone a huge expansion in the last year, says company president Corey Mandell, 29.

"In a span of 365 days, we went from a floor space of 5,000 square feet to 20,000 square feet to house all of our facilities."

Mandell explained that the company he heads has grown in several new directions: it opened Mandell Entertainment Group Amusements (MEGA), significantly expanding its carnival and arcade game rental division; it introduced a new line of fun foods; it launched its own record label; next month will see the opening of a new banquet facility co-owned by Mandell Entertainment; and in January, it will begin offering break-dance classes at a dance studio located on the company's Richmond Hill premises.

Mandell Entertainment Group (905-886-4000), now in its ninth year, began with four DJs. One of them was Mandell. His interactive style was so popular at bar and bat mitzvahs that he was booked solid every weekend, and often a year or two in advance of the simchahs.

He trained other DJs and hired dancers, increasing the number of staff on the roster every year. Today there are more than 250 part-time and 12 full-time staff members, Mandell said, noting that the company offers one-stop shopping for party decor, fun foods like Hawaiian shaved ice and the rental of games and inflatable entertainment units like Bungee Run.

These days, Mandell can frequently be found in North Toronto at the Capitol Theatre on Yonge Street at Castlefield Avenue. The theatre is the site of the new event venue he co-owns with three other partners – TSN show host Michael Landsberg, builder Gary Eisen and lawyer Michael Kleinman.

There are more than 250 part-time and 12 full-time staff members.

'It's a professional stage'

"I first had the idea to develop a banquet facility eight years ago, but we didn't have the right property," Mandell said.

"It's being restored back to its 1918 original mouldings. They were covered up by a drop ceiling and movie screen. Basically, no one had seen them for 60 years. We've spent well over $1 million in renovations…We brought in top interior designers to refurbish it."

A dome, also hidden, covers almost the whole width of the ceiling, he said.

"We've restored a full Vaudeville stage. We excavated a basement and built the lounge on the balcony floor, and there's a full-service kitchen. The place can comfortably seat 400 people for dinner, 350 with a dance floor, and 850 for a stand-up cocktail party," he said.

"The theme of the building is an early Art Deco theatre with a dash of Studio 54. It's done in creams and it's extremely elegant. It's the first up-scale venue in Toronto that you rent strictly for an event.

"It's very versatile. One night, we can have a bar; the next night, a movie screening or Broadway show or a concert – it's a professional stage.

"The Capitol is going to be the most unique party facility in Toronto. It's a Mandell Entertainment exclusive…We're getting bookings like crazy."

The Mandell Entertainment recording studio and record company is currently managing and producing records for several local bands, he said.

"The recording studio was developed so we could produce our own original music at our events. We also wanted to produce and record local young talent."

He explained that the company's extensive contact with teens and preteens – aside from bar/bat mitzvahs, the company does camp and school concerts – made producing records a "natural fit," because he already has the right demographic audience and a natural venue for airing music on the Mandell label. "We wanted to integrate our business in as many dimensions as possible."

He recently completed a new CD for the group EQ, formally known as the Simpletones. "Right now we're shopping it with some distributors. EQ would be the same demographics as the Back Street Boys. We're going to distribution companies and trying to sign an appropriate deal."

Roots is still a "special sponsor for the company," Mandell said. "We provide Roots giveaways at all our concerts. We teamed up with Roots and CISS92 for school dances...They are hosted by Mandell and personalities from CISS92."

MEGA was inaugurated because of the huge demand for amusement and arcade games, and carnival games and inflatables, he said. "We went out and researched the product, and we currently hold a half million dollars in inventory."

The inflatables include bouncers, slides and interactive games, such as an oversized boxing ring, jousting and laser tag.

"We introduced arcade games like ring toss. We've got a full casino, and our slot machines run on fun tokens.The kids trade in the tokens for prizes."

Mandell also spoke about the company's exclusive line of fun foods – Dip and Dots Ice Cream and Hawaiian Shaved Ice (he has Canadian exclusivity for both products).

As for the dance school, Mandell said that almost all those signing up for the lessons are boys. "The kids think it's really cool.

"We've had such phenomenal results with the dance team going out to the parties, especially with our Buggy Brats break-dance crew, that we're offering lessons.

"The kids want to learn those dances. We're offering the lessons because the kids want to know how to dance at the parties."

Despite the expansion of the company, Mandell still does DJ work, and he's still booked solid every weekend, he said.

How is he able to manage the operation?

"We try to hire staff to oversee each area," he says. "I hire great people, so I can delegate responsibility."

You're invited to our party

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

Invitations set the tone of the party, says Terry Kirshenbaum of Invitation House. "People are struck when they get something very unusual."

Invitation House (416-593-0519) at 350 Adelaide St. W., in the heart of Toronto's fashion and gallery district, is an invitation company with a long history. It was started 33 years ago as an offshoot of Kern Stationers Ltd., a high-end commercial printing company.

Kern Stationers' founder Ben Kirshenbaum saw that there was an unfilled niche for customized social invitations, and he brought his wife, Lillian, into the business to run that division. When their daughter Terry finished her business degree she came to work for her parents.

It was supposed to be for a year. But two children and some two decades later, Terry's still there. "I was smitten. I loved it," she says. "They were the best people to work for."

Terry has been in the business for 15 years. She ran Invitation House for seven years; and following the death of both her parents, she's been running Kern Stationers as well for the last eight years.

She recently created a line of children's stationery and journals in their memory, called Layben.

Terry says Invitation House is known for its customized designs. "We're a full-service facility." The company offers blind embossing, a colourless, raised three-dimensional look; hot stamping, foil borders or lettering; thermography, simulated engraving with raised shiny lettering; genuine copperplate engraving and calligraphy.

Invitation House can also print artwork in several colours and reproduce photographs on paper. "We're happy to add on," Terry says. But the extras cost more, she notes.

They can work within any budget, however, by offering a less expensive alternative – invitations from the standard catalogues.

Invitation House works closely with clients, by appointment, to create something the clients feel is reflective of the type of party they are going to host, Terry says. "And we try very hard to work within their budget."

She recommends that people send out their invitations four weeks in advance to guests in town and five weeks for those out of town. But it's better to give eight weeks' notice in the summer or during holidays, she says, because people often go out of town.

Barbara Mortfield Invitations (905-738-1232) has been a fixture in the Greater Toronto Area for more than three decades. Barbara worked from her home while raising her four children. For many years, the dining room was her office.

Although her children are grown – she's now a grandmother of three – her business is still home-based. But 14 years ago, she moved to a house with a real office on the main floor.

An attractive invitation can set the tone for the party you host. [Invitations supplied by Invitation House.]

It only has to look expensive

An innovator in the invitation business, Barbara says she was the first person in Toronto to offer discount invitations – she charges 20 to 25 percent less than the catalogue prices. She carries invitations for every budget and she also does customized instant invitations by computer.

Barbara's daughter Lisa is a partner in the calligraphy division. Envelopes are addressed by computer, Barbara explains. "We offer excellent, prompt, and very beautiful computer calligraphy service to match any type, style and colour."

Barbara can save on the cost by creating custom-looking invitations from the catalogues, she says. "Everything can be customized. My motto is 'It doesn't have to be expensive. It just has to look expensive.'"

She says the cost is very important to many people, and she checks if her customers are on a budget. "For some people, it's not important to spend a lot of money. I show them something good-looking, but simpler."

American invitations are higher-priced than Canadian ones, but Barbara says many people prefer the American companies because "they are more innovative and they carry wonderful papers, fabrics and trims."

She says she's been working closely with Canadian companies to help them redesign their catalogues, and some are achieving the innovative look of American invitations.

That look is epitomized by elongated oversized cards. "I believe that the oversized cards look better," she says. "But they cost more to mail."

They can also get crushed in the mail, she says. To combat this problem, she invented ExBendables, acrylic inserts that prevent cards from being bent by the mailperson. She also supplies them to other invitation companies and printers.

Barbara says she's been in the business so long that the people whose wedding invitations she did 15 and 20 years ago are coming back for bar and bat mitzvah invitations for their children.

Crafts make great gifts

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

While everyone values well-made brand name presents, a one-of-a-kind crafted gift means something extra special. In a crafted gift, three people's unique personalities and feelings come together – yours, the recipient's and the artist's.

Love for a dear friend or relative may be too unique to express in standardized form. Then, even the finest manufactured article may fall short of what you want to express.

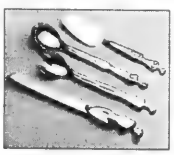
If you have an artistic streak and time to make something special, there are places where you can craft your gift. If you don't want to try this, there are places where you can purchase distinctive, hand-crafted gifts, especially chosen to convey your message.

One place where you can create your own gift is Ricki Horowitz and Wynter Rosen's ceramic studio, Marvellous Mess (416-481-2328).

Marvellous Mess paints ceramicware for its retail business, and wholesale export. They also have a paint-your-own facility – which is where you come in.

You can visit the store whenever it's open. From among Marvellous Mess' own work and some from other companies, you choose your shape and size of bisque – a piece that has been fired once in the kiln but is still unfinished.

Your personal instructor gives a lesson with a written guide on ceramic painting, including various types of underglaze. (An underglaze is a pigment which does not seal a pot, whereas a glaze seals it, making it non-porous.) There are 20 to 25 different colors.



First, you wipe the pot to make it dust-free and then you pencil on the design. Then come the colours, in a sequence guided by the instructor. You are encouraged to develop your own ideas; the instructor doesn't do the work for you.

Most people who come as individuals paint for 1½ to two hours. Starting with simple designs and smaller pieces, they advance to larger pieces and more complex designs.

The are group sessions too. For a bridal shower, for example, a group of friends bring the bride, who picks the pieces and colours she wants; then they sit and paint gifts together. There are also birthday parties for kids age eight and over, for groups of 12 or more. One instructor is devoted to your group only.

Adult parties last for 2½ hours, kids' parties 1½. Bring your own food or have it catered. And book two to three weeks ahead.

For a wide choice of unique pieces crafted for you in different mediums, visit Sara Levine Petroff's A Show of Hands (416-782-1696). Part of the current Upper Village revival, A Show of Hands is located in a former bank with 20-foot ceilings and marbie inlay floors and walls, ideal for showing art in the best light.

A Show of Hands promotes over 300 artists, 85 percent of them Canadian. Every province is represented, with emphasis on British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec.

Worth seeing for its own sake, this gallery is for novice and seasoned collectors alike. To learn about an artist's exhibits and main influences, you can read a c.v. on site. You can commission work here as well.

You'll see hand-blown glass, ceramics, jewelry, metalwork, and wooden bowls. Textile and fibre art includes quilts, scarves, two-dimensional felt, sculpted basketry, and one-of-a-kind dolls. Also, you'll see Canada's largest display of contemporary one of-a-kind kaleidoscopes.

Alongside ornamental work, there are functional display pieces. Much of the art shows Oriental or Judaic influences, and there's a Judaica collection.

There's also a bridal registry, and a gift wrapping room in the former bank vault!

Of the ceramics, raku, a firing technique from 16th-century Japan, merits special mention. The bisque is fired to remove all the moisture. The piece is then glazed, and returned to the kiln at 2,000 to 2,400 degrees celsius. This turns the clay to stone.

Once the piece reaches the high temperature, the glaze starts to run. The piece is then taken from the kiln and set in a fireproof container with a flammable material, such as newspaper or pine needles, which catches fire from the vessel's heat.

The glaze, meanwhile, is bubbling; and the burning material interacts with the glaze on some parts of the vessel, creating different effects, depending on what is burnt. The areas where the glaze runs turn black, and contrast in color and texture with the areas where the glaze interacts with the flammable material.

Whether you paint the gift yourself at Marvellous Mess, or find it waiting for you at A Show of Hands, the possibilities are endless.

Many new gowns show accents of colour, says Kim Ironmonger.

Be a beautiful bride

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

When calculating the cost of a bridal gown, keep in mind alteration and upgrade charges, such as adding crinoline, says Kim Ironmonger, owner of Valencienne Bridal Design (416-781-6885), a bridal boutique located at 1104 Eglinton Ave. W, just west of Bathurst Street.

"Usually people give the price of the dress and by the time they factor in all the extra charges, it's not the price that was originally given," Ironmonger said.

If you are looking to save money, she suggests buying a ready-made dress rather than a custom-made one. Or, another cost-cutting technique is buying your gown from a manufacturer or factory, she said.

Ironmonger warns shoppers to watch out for salespeople whose main interest is making a quick sell.

"They're just into selling a dress and getting the bride out the door, which isn't a very nice environment or a friendly experience," she said.

So look for salespeople who give substantial information about the dresses, she advised.

As for the latest styles, many new gowns have accents of color, Ironmonger noted.

"We're showing a lot of colour on gowns. Bustiers are in. We're doing a lot of Shakespeare In Love, Victorian kind of look," she said.

Soft ice blue, champagne or blush pink are popular accent colours for dresses.

Ironmonger recommends choosing a dress six to eight months in advance of the wedding.

Vintner stakes reputation on Israeli wines

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

With the new millennium just weeks away, many people are beginning to stock up on champagne. Carol Slatt of Lorac Wine (416-783-2516) recommends toasting the new year with Israeli champagne. "Carmel makes a great champagne."

Slatt, who has been in the wine and spirits business for 17 years, says she stakes her reputation on Israeli wines and spirits. Representing fine non-kosher wines from Italy, Spain, and Portugal, she insists she can match the quality of these wines with kosher wines from Israel.

The agent for Carmel, a co-operative of 800 growers, and Israel's largest producer of wines and spirits, Slatt says she promotes kosher wines and tries to enhance the selection available in the market place. "My mandate is to encourage the government monopoly to continue to broaden their already excellent collection of wines that are of good quality and that happen to be kosher."

Slatt is adamant about supporting the wine and spirits industry in Israel. "One of the things that the general population does not recognize is that the production of wine and spirits is a major industry in Israel. It's an enormous industry that supports the Israeli economy."

She stresses that when people buy Israeli wine they are supporting the economy of Israel. "Given that we support Israel in so many ways this is a simple way. The community should very proud to support the Israeli economy in this manner."

She says Israeli wines offer good quality at a good price. "The product is equally good and price point equally good [as the wine from other countries]... A lot of non-Jewish people buy wines from Israel."

Slatt notes that in the past, Israeli wine was sweet and traditional, and that the community "was forced to buy kosher wine from Israel because they were the only ones that were kosher," but the quality has improved considerably over the years.

"Generally speaking, the quality of today's wines and spirits [from Israel] can compete with wines and spirits from every part of the world in term of quality, packaging, presentation and certainty in terms of price."

A grandmother of two and the mother of two grown children, Slatt got involved in the wines and spirits business because of her love of fine wines and food, having travelled extensively with her husband, Dr. Bernard Slatt, she says.

She started by representing a producer of fine French cognac and progressed to Italian wines; she says, "Bit by bit I learned about the business... The kosher aspect came several years after." Today she has a staff of 10.

As for the name Lorac, it's her name – Carol spelled backwards, she explains. "I needed a name for the company, Lorac sounds French."

As her business grew she realized there was a niche in kosher wine that she could fill, she says. "There was a whole underground. At the airport I used to watch people bring wine from New York in their luggage... I went around the world looking for kosher wine."

She was eventually approached by Claude Abrams of Galilee Wine to do marketing and sales for Carmel. "Ultimately I became a partner in Galilee, the official authorized Canadian agent on record for Carmel. I own half of Galilee. I'm the whole owner of Lorac which does all the marketing."

At Lorac offices at 160 Tycos Dr. there are tasting rooms so that people can come to see what's available, she says. "For people calling on the phone asking for information we're happy to meet with them to discuss the needs for their functions...

"We do tons of functions for as many as 2,000 people attending an evening affair to a private dinner for 10. One of the strong points is that we take the time. [Once] we matched a cocktail to the tablecloth. We created a blue drink. That was one of the funniest thing we've ever done."

Her advice to customers is "to enjoy the very best you can afford."

Some of the kosher white available through Carmel's Private Collection series include a Chardonnay, a fine dry white wine, Emerald Riesling, and Muscat, a dessert wine.

From the Vineyards Series, which is less expensive than the Private Collection, one can choose an Emerald Reisling, Sauvignon Blanc, (white) or Cabernet Souvignon, a dry red wine, she says.

Slatt suggests making a kosher Martini for the millennium with Carmel's vermouth and Stopka vodka and topping the evening off with 12-year old Brandy XO. "Everything is available through the LCBO."

Wines from France may be cachet, but, she says. "I've decided I want to support Carmel in Israel in a most important way. I'm very committed to Israel. This is my contribution to the economy of Israel."

Memorable moments from Mister Disc Jockey

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

We remember longest the moments we live for their own sake, like the happiest times of childhood. And when Mister Disc Jockey (905-473-3800) entertains you, you live every moment for its own sake. Mister Disc Jockey's Ed McMurtry sees his company's mission as giving you back your childhood.

Mister Disc Jockey's specialty is entertainment packages. Corporate clients include CIBC, whose executives they once persuaded to go onstage dressed as the Beatles, the Village People and the Stones, while their staff sang, danced and whooped along with them. Ed also has many testimonials from private clients.

Mister Disc Jockey is interactive across the board. They script every moment of a party, from when the first guest arrives until the last one leaves, and involve every guest from the youngest to the eldest.

Ed knows how to make every moment fun. "You have 30 seconds to get an audience's attention, and another minute to hold it," he says; "so you get good at engaging people's interest in one-and-a-half minutes."

Sometimes these days, Ed is dragged offstage to produce and direct events; but he and his staff have kept their passion for hands-on entertainment. At least once a week, Ed likes to get onstage himself.

Ed has no inhibitions about the medium he works in: he'll do whatever fits the event. That includes everything from designing fantastic stage sets to hiring celebrities like André-Philippe Gagnon. And if your celebration is in Hawaii, he'll fly there.

Mister DJ sells a party tailored to the client.

But Ed isn't selling Ed McMurtry. He's selling a party tailored to the client. If he took sick, the show would go on. It's not he who's the celebrity, but the show; and it's his events he's recognized for, not his personality.

The client is king; and it isn't enough for Ed to know that Mister Disc Jockey will give every show their best. The client has to know this too.

At the same time, Ed likes to have a lot of creative input. He identifies three elements of a party:
1) what the client wants;
2) what the guests want;
3) the reason the client calls – namely, Mister Disc Jockey's creativity.

Ed sees his work as making element three impact on one and two, and that the client wants him to make every event unique by giving it his best.

> Both kids and adults have lots more fun

Ed knows from experience, for example, that kids devour their food in 20 seconds flat. Accordingly, he asks a client if it's all right to do what the kids want during the main course, keeping them occupied so the adults can enjoy dinner. That way, both kids and adults have more fun.

On such questions, he works with whatever answer the client gives. He's successful enough in pleasing kids that bar mitzvah clients ask him: "You're good with kids; can you work with adults?" Corporate types, on the other hand, often ask: "The office party was great; what about my kid's birthday?"

Mister Disc Jockey's 10-acre estate has studios, workshops, and guest activities. Ed can do tours, client appreciation and family fun days here, and he's thinking about a day camp. Park activities include bouncy houses, a dinosaur you can go inside, and an inflatable driving range where he once held a golf tournament.

Among Mister Disc Jockey's memorable occasions was one with a sports theme, where a goalie mingled and interacted with the guests.

At another event, character actors playing fake paparazzi asked guests for autographs.

At a dinner with 5,000 guests, there was a band onstage playing classical music; then a rock band came out and mixed with them. At dessert, the waiters started heckling the band, who challenged them to come onstage and do better. So the waiters doffed their waiter jackets, and transformed themselves into a group of singers, Polly and the Good Fellows.

Mister Disc Jockey works closely with other party professionals. Ed will recommend local videographers, for example, to do tribute videos; or if you prefer, Mister Disc Jockey will make the video, then give it to the client's choice of videographer to script and produce.

Mister Disc Jockey's ambition is to do all the best parties; so book as much as one-and-a-half, even two years ahead, to avoid date conflicts. A company which has featured celebrities like André-Philippe Gagnon, and done shows as far away as Hawaii, is very much in demand.

A rose is a rose is a great wedding flower

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

This year, everything's coming up roses, says Sandra Raffa of the Toronto Florist Shop in Thornhill (905-764-6332).

Roses seem to be more popular than ever, she says noting that for weddings, in particular, roses in pastel hues are very much in vogue.

She says flowers mark so many occasions – birthdays, anniversaries, births, and holidays – and the Toronto Flower Shop (75 Glen Cameron Rd., Unit 4), located just north of Yonge and Steeles offers daily delivery service throughout the GTA.

The shop, which has been around for 10 years, specializes in weddings, providing bouquets for the bride and attendants, ceremonies, corsages for mothers, grandmothers, and other female family members, boutonnieres for the men, ceremonial flowers to decorate the sanctuary and of course centrepieces for the banquet.

Roses are still the most popular flower for weddings, Raffa says. For boutonnieres — they start at $5 — roses are extremely common. The groom usually sports a white rose, and she likes to match the ushers' boutonnieres to the colours in the bridesmaids' bouquets, she adds.

Roses in pastel hues are very much in vogue, says Sandra Raffa of Toronto Florist Shop.

Corsages, which start at $6, are often made up of roses and orchids; the flowers are chosen to co-ordinate with the colour of the dress being worn, she says.

The bridal bouquet (they start at $90), which is usually comprised of white and cream roses, may also contain freesia, a very small white flower with a nice scent and/or stephanotis, another small, white star-shaped flower with a beautiful fragrance, Raffa notes.

Everyone usually has their eye on the bouquet after the ceremony when it's tossed to the unmarried female guests. As the legend goes, the girl who catches the bouquet is supposed to be the next to marry.

However, anyone who pays close attention may notice that the bouquet thrown these days is often not the one used by the bride during the ceremony. Indeed, many brides want to keep their bouquets, and so Raffa says she makes up a complimentary bouquet for the traditional bouquet throwaway.

As for the attendants' bouquets, which start at $40, Raffa says she tries to choose flowers that can be co-ordinated with the colour scheme of the wedding.

One popular trend this summer was hand-tied bouquets of roses in soft pastels — peaches, pinks and creams, Raffa says. "It depends on what they're wearing... You don't want to use a lot of the same colour as the dress because you need contrast. Otherwise people won't see the flowers and they won't show up in the pictures."

While traditionally flower girls carry baskets with a few flowers or petals, the latest style is flower-ball;

Try out new hairdo in advance of party

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

Curling, braiding and crimping hair was out of style for a long time.

But these hair-dos are back in vogue, says Cathy Rodrigues, owner of Enricos Hair Salon (416-482-8055).

Women can expect a reasonably-priced updo to cost between $35 to $50.

For brides wanting an updo, Rodrigues advises she try out the hairstyle in advance and bring in her veil and a picture of the dress for the hairdresser.

"The hair reflects the gown, the gown reflects the hair. The two should go together," she says.

Rodrigues does not recommend trying anything drastic like cutting or highlighting hair right before a wedding.

If a bride is highlighting her hair, she should have it done at least two weeks before the wedding, she says.

That way, she can assess whether her hair is too blond or too dark and whether she wants more or less hair highlighted.

Rodrigues advises brides to avoid hairdressers that are "scissor-happy" and ensure you get a hair-do that's you.

It is all right to be daring but make sure your hair is not so outrageous that it makes you feel insecure or uncomfortable, she says.

"Make sure you feel like yourself," she said.

Roses are still most popular flowers for weddings

flowers are stuck into a little round ball attached with ribbons. She says the flower balls start at $50 because they're very labour-intensive to make.

The flowers for the ceremony dress up the room especially if it is very plain, according to Raffa. The flowers make it special. They add the ceremonial touch to the room.

Ceremony flowers tend to be standard large arrangements that go near the chupah, she explains, and the colour of the flowers are co-ordinated to the colours of the wedding. Gladioli are very common for these kinds of arrangements as are snapdragons, lilies, roses and gerbera daisies, she says. The large arrangements which start at $75 can also be used for the banquet.

Aisle and chupah decorating, usually with greens and tulle or satin and/ or co-ordinating flowers is also a popular trend, she says. "It's whatever fits the budget. I've decorated the chupah polls with flowers. The most popular is tulling with greens."

She suggests decorating the aisles with ribbon and tulling across the chairs and with greens every second row, and perhaps some little flower clusters. She also rents out aisle carpets.

Centrepieces can vary considerably from a simple rose in a bud vase to an elaborate arrangement on a stand with a cascade of roses and orchids, she says. "Some people like low, round arrangements on the table so that people can see the other people at the table.

"We can use the votive candles which are placed around the flowers or taper candles in the arrangement, or even floating candles. A large bowl is filled with water and we float roses and candles. Roses arranged in a vase has also become very popular."

She says people on a budget can forgo the aisle decor, and have a smaller arrangement at the ceremony, but the bouquets and centre pieces are still critical. "I try to work within their budgets. We can go for less expensive flowers, but keep the same colour scheme."

She noted that for luncheon bar or bat mitzvahs people tend to use more balloons. "For the evening, formal dinners often include floral centrepieces. For a Thanksgiving bar mitzvah I did flowers, fruit, and vegetables. It was a harvest theme, which is very seasonal."

Centrepieces can vary from one rose to an elaborate arrangement.

She offers free consultations by appointment, she says. "We've got industry catalogues and we keep photographs of all my work. Every thing is customized. It's very rare that someone would want exactly the same as someone else."

As for her line of work, Raffa says, "It's a lot of hard work. But it's lots of fun. You're working with beautiful flowers... There are so many possibilities.

"Flower arranging is real art. No two pieces are exactly the same. You have to be creative to make this kind of stuff. You have to take what the customer is saying and translate it into the final creation."

Interactive company provides a breath of new, fresh ideas

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Entertainment Xtreme (416-488-8411) creates interactive entertainment – and don't yawn at that overworked word "interactive." This company is different.

It offers you a welcome breath of fresh ideas, blended with good old-fashioned belief in the personal touch.

Entertainment Xtreme's Jared Florence has enjoyed nine years in the industry, starting as assistant to a top DJ.

Even then, he interacted with party guests, dancing and mingling with them to make sure everyone had as much fun as he did.

He's done about 500 events since then, mostly bar or bat mitzvahs, with some weddings, corporate events and fund-raisers. "I have a childlike side," he says, "so I like working with kids."

He makes his living making people happy, and has fun while he's at it.

The party is for the client and guests, but the entertainers should enjoy themselves too, he says. The mood's contagious; if guests see the entertainers having fun, they join in.

Childlike though he is, Florence is a mature, responsible adult when doing business. His clients can reach him any time they need him; and they know this.

He's there for you from your initial phone call, and at your side throughout your event, to the final song.

Information can be faxed or e-mailed, but to establish trust and rapport, it's best to meet face to face, he says. And book early. Entertainment Xtreme has engagements as far ahead as January 2002.

Besides guests and staff, Florence has good rapport with other professionals, such as caterers. As he wants every event to be an all-around success, he enjoys this side of his work too.

What makes Entertainment Xtreme unique?

Dress is crucial. It's usually the first thing you notice about someone; and for an entertainer, it indicates his role. Will he play the event straight, like a classical musician in a tux? Will he clown a little? Or something of both?

Entertainment Xtreme's costumes run the gamut from Hawaiian shirts to tuxedos. They have a full range of props, novelties, prizes and other party supplies, state-of-the-art digital sound systems, dance platforms, indoor fireworks and special effects.

But whatever high-tech devices add to an event, the personal touch matters most. Florence wears a cordless headset mike, not because it's high-tech, but to let him move easily through the crowd.

His team consists of at least two people: himself as MC or "animator" (the term he prefers, since he's there to animate the party); and a DJ as partner. Often, two female dancers mingle with the guests, getting them to dance and sing along.

To envision what Entertainment Xtreme brings to a bar or bat mitzvah, imagine an animator in a tux, Mylar wig, sunglasses and neon necklace!

Or what about a flaming machete juggler on a giant unicycle? Sound ridiculous? "Trust me," Florence says. "It is."

At a bar or bat mitzvah, Florence spends lots of time offstage hanging out with the kids, finding out what they like. He learns their dance steps and moves, and teaches them what he knows; and he invents or improvises steps too.

"It's a great workout," he smiles, "dancing all night long."

Kids are still listening to the Backstreet Boys, Spice Girls and Will Smith, and songs like Car Wash, Jump, Jive and Wail, Grease, and Mambo #5. They also like the '50s, '60s and '70s, though; and the swing revival is still going strong.

While an event should be lively, it can't be continuously fast-paced. Scattered among up-tempo songs are slower ones, so that guests can catch their breath, and the adults can enjoy a quieter moment. And there's no "dead air" – there's always music, except when it's out of place (say, during speeches).

Florence likes to see kids dancing to the old standards, and adults of all ages moving to the new music. He enjoys seeing guests not only dress up, but step up to the mike and let their friends hear them.

Of the parties he's animated, Florence highlights a bat mitzvah in 1995 at the Atlantis nightclub, with a revolving dance floor. The 350 guests danced all night long.

But every good party is unique. You'll remember yours for its own sake, not by comparison with other events. Florence wants each party to be a once-in-a-lifetime experience.

Jared Florence of Entertainment Xtreme.

Simchah baskets a good alternative

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

If you're planning a simchah and need centrepieces, consider an arrangement with canned tuna, sardines, peanut butter and perhaps some packages of kosher crackers or cookies.

Sounds unusual for a centrepiece? The food centrepiece is called a simchah basket and with the right packaging and decorations the foodstuffs can be attractively presented. Once the the simchah is over, the food can be donated to one of five local kosher food banks. Donors can even get a tax receipt for the cost of the food.

The simchah basket program, initiated by Jewish Women's Federation (JWF), is meant to be an alternative to the more traditional centrepieces, says Rochelle Reichert, chair of the simchah basket program. Decorative baskets filled with non-perishable foods, are placed on each of the guest tables, and information cards about the program are attached to each basket for the guests to read, she explained.

"The simchah basket adds a new dimension to a celebration like a bar or bat mitzvah. It's an opportunity to teach children about tzedakah and promote awareness about poverty."

She said JWF has been targeting bar and bat mitzvah simchahs, but people have also done them for weddings and community and corporate functions.

She noted that the simchah basket programs have been running in several North American cities, among them Chicago, Vancouver and Hamilton, and in Toronto, people had been doing the baskets on their own for a number of years until the program was officially inaugurated a year ago."We've had a lot of positive response and the hosts and hostesses say they have had really positive responses from their guests."

She said JWF supports the Toronto kosher food banks already in place. "We identified five of them. Now we have a sixth. We created an association whereby we could provide them with food."

The food banks include The Pride of Israel Synagogue kosher food bank; Tomchai Shabbas in the Bathurst Glencairn area; Yad Chesed in Thornhill; Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) and The National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) Passover food drive.

She said an inter-synagogue kosher food bank, to be held at Beth Sholom Synagogue, will be collecting food from most of the conservative synagogues along with synagogues from other denominations.

Reichert said Jewish Women International in Vancouver makes the centrepieces. "If you call the JWF office we'll provide you with guidelines to put together your own simchah basket. We'll also provide you with the names of professionals who know how to make the baskets. You can go to a florist or decor person of your choice."

A simchah basket

JWF also provides guidelines for the food needs of the different agencies, Reichert said.

"The needs of the food banks are different than what JF&CS needs... Baskets are given intact to JF&CS. The social workers take the gift baskets to families.

"We do a geographical match. We match you with an agency as close as possible to your simchah, but we also try to balance the distribution of food."

Reichert said the committee recommends that people put at least $10 worth of kosher non-perishable food in each centrepiece. A list of food with the different kosher symbols is provided to all participants.

At Passover time, people are encouraged to buy kosher for Passover food for the NCJW Passover food drive.

"The centrepieces can be elaborate or simple. I've seen some with food put in cellophane and elaborate ones too."

She said to participate in the simchah basket program, simchah hosts need only call the JWF office. "We will actually hook you up to an agency and your name will be given to a committee member. They call you to see if you have any questions."

Arrangements for transporting the food must also be made; many agencies have volunteers who can pick up the food, she said. "We try to make it as easy as possible. If you can provide a bill for the purchase of the food, the agency will write you a receipt."

A week after the simchah the host/ hostess gets a phone call from the assigned committee member to find out about the simchah and the simchah baskets, Reichert said.

"It's a program addressing the needs of the poor...We want to raise the awareness of poverty in the [Jewish] community and this is a good way. It doesn't solve the problem, but it raises awareness."

Kosher halls great for all types of parties

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Grand Caterers is now the exclusive kosher caterer at Royalton Banquet Centre and Regency Banquet Centre (905-851-2325).

Beginning in January, says owner Robert Marra, each banquet facility will have its own kosher kitchen. "Until now, we have been bringing in kosher food. With our own meat and pareve kosher kitchen, the food will be hotter and fresher, and we will have more flexibility with regards to special orders and custom-made menus," he says.

The Royalton, in operation for four years, which holds up to 800 people, and the recently opened Regency, which holds up to 700 people, each have "huge lobbies that are great for cocktail parties and hors-d'oeuvres before dinner. A working gas fireplace at the Regency adds a cosy touch to the lobby."

The 20-foot high ceilings, cornice mouldings and huge chandeliers at the halls add "elegance to any party," says Marra.

Joe Elmaleh, owner of King Solomon's Table (416-630-0666) says that when people make a party at his restaurant, "they can leave the details to us. We'll put them in touch with a decorator who has worked with us and knows what looks best at our hall, a disc jockey, a florist – whatever the client wants. It makes arranging the party a lot easier; it becomes a worry-free simchah."

Marra says, that especially for people making their first simchah, it makes things a lot easier if "we help them out with all the details. Many people just do not know where to turn first. We're there to help them out."

King Solomon's Table is in operation six days a week, says Elmaleh, so it makes things easier if people need a special request "on the spot. If a guest comes in with a fish allergy, we can easily make up a special meal for them. The kitchen is always functioning."

The room, which seats up to 310 people without dancing and about 260 with dancing, can accommodate smaller parties of about 100 people, says Elmaleh.

"We're quite careful about sticking to a client's budget, and we make sure that we make a successful party on any budget. Whether we serve two, three or four courses, or high or lower end beef, we make it look like a lot was spent," he says.

When clients book at King Solomon's table, says Elmaleh, there are no surprises. "They can come in for a taste test before the party, so they know exactly what they are serving their guests.

"Usually, hosts are too busy to eat at their own party, but when guests talk about the meal, the hosts will have tasted it beforehand. They've had a prelude to the event."

For children's parties, he says, the kosher Chinese buffet is "a great hit. It is a great change from the usual chicken fingers and french fries."

Other kosher places advertising in this supplement are: Baycrest Hospitality Services, 416-785-2500 ext. 2477; Sheraton Centre of Toronto, 416-361-1000.

The perfect dessert

Mmm-chocolate cake

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Chocolate cake is my idea of the perfect dessert. You can dress it up for the holidays or slap one together for the kids after school.

The following recipes have received rave reviews. You will note that there are one or two recipes that use box mixes. Don't try and substitute your favorite chocolate cake recipe. The recipes are based on using the cake mixes' stabilizers and won't come out as nicely if you don't follow the instructions.

All of these recipes freeze well and can be made a week or two ahead of time.

CHEATER'S CHOCOLATE INSIDE-OUT CAKE

1 package chocolate cake mix
4½ oz. package instant chocolate pudding
1¼ cups milk (or water or non dairy creamer)
2 eggs
12 oz. package chocolate chips

In a large bowl combine everything except the chocolate chips. Mix for 3 minutes. Fold in chocolate chips. Pour into greased or sprayed tube pan. Bake 50-60 minutes as per mix package instructions. Cool 15 minutes in the pan. Remove from pan and cool completely.

BANANA CHOCOLATE CHIP CAKE

1 cup sugar
½ cup shortening
2 eggs
3 bananas, mashed
2 cups flour
1½ tsp. baking soda
1 cup of chocolate chips

In a mixing bowl cream together the sugar and shortening. Add eggs one at a time and the bananas. Add the remaining ingredients and mix for about 2 to 3 minutes. Place the batter into a greased 9x5- inch loaf pan. Bake at 325f for approximately 1 hour.

RICH CHOCOLATE CHERRY CAKE

2 cups flour
¾ cup sugar
¾ cup oil
2 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. cinnamon
21 oz. can cherry pie filling
6 oz. semisweet chocolate chips
1 cup chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 350f. In large bowl combine the flour, sugar, oil, eggs, vanilla, baking soda and cinnamon and mix well. Stir in the pie filling, chocolate chips and nuts. Do not over mix. Pour the batter into a greased bundt pan. Bake for one hour. Cool for 10 to 15 minutes and then unmold cake on racks to cool.

PECAN-TOPPED CHOCOLATE POUND CAKE

1 cup of sweet butter (or margarine)
½ cup shortening
2½ cups sugar
5 eggs
3 cups all-purpose flour
½ cup cocoa
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup milk
1 cup chopped pecans

In a bowl, combine butter and shortening, mix well. Then gradually add the sugar, beating until light and fluffy. Add the eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. In another bowl combine flour, cocoa, and baking powder then sift them together. Add the flour mixture to the creamed mixture alternately with the milk, beginning and ending with flour mixture. Mix well after each addition. Add vanilla to mixture. Pour batter into a well-greased 10-inch tube pan. Sprinkle pecans evenly over batter. Bake at 325f for 1 hour and 15 minutes or until cake tests done. Cool in pan 15 minutes; remove from pan, and let cake cool completely.

CHOCOLATE ZUCCHINI CAKE

3 cups flour
1¼ tsp. baking powder
1¼ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. cinnamon
4 eggs
3 cups sugar
1½ cups oil
3 squares unsweetened chocolate, melted
1½ tsp. vanilla
½ tsp. almond extract
3 cups grated zucchini
1 cup nuts
½ cup chopped dates

Sift flour, baking powder, and baking soda, salt and cinnamon together and set aside. In an electric mixing bowl beat the eggs until frothy. Add the sugar and oil to the eggs, mix well. Add in the chocolate, as well as the vanilla and almond extracts. Fold the dry ingredients into the chocolate mixture. Add the zucchini, nuts and dates. Pour the batter into a greased 10-inch bundt pan. Bake 350f for 1 hour and 15 minutes. Let stand inverted on cake pan for 20 minutes.

CHOCOLATE AMARETTO CAKE

1 lb. butter, softened
3 cups sugar
6 eggs, well beaten
2 tsp. pure almond extract
4 cups flour
¾ cup unsweetened cocoa powder, sifted and added to flour
2 tsp. baking soda sifted and added to flour
1 tsp. baking powder sifted and added to flour
1 cup milk
1 cup amaretto (almond liqueur)
2 cups toasted almonds, ground

Preheat oven to 350f. Generously butter and flour a 10-inch bundt pan and set aside. Cream together the butter and the sugar. The butter should be soft, but not melted. Add the beaten eggs and almond extract and mix well. Blend in two cups of the flour mix. Combine the milk and ¼ cup of the amaretto and stir into the batter, mixing well. Add the remaining flour mix, mixing well. Fold in the ground almonds and pour the batter into the bundt pan. Bake for one hour or until a toothpick tests clean. Cool the cake in the pan for 15 minutes and then pour the remaining ¾ cup of amaretto over the warm cake. Let the amaretto soak in and then invert the plate. Remove the pan from the cake when thoroughly cool.

Eight ways to make Chanukah a family affair

By RABBI CHERIE KOLLER-FOX
Jewish Family & Life!
www.JewishFamily.com

When our children were small, they would look forward to Chanukah each year. They loved the candles and latkes and, of course, the presents.

However, soon they were rushing through the candles to get to the presents and they had no patience to sing songs or even to play dreidel. The present orgy got quickly out of control with three children and eight days, not to mention grandparents, gift exchanges and the like.

What inevitably happened was that the evening, which started out with great excitement and anticipation, often ended badly. A toy would break or someone got something that someone else had wanted, and the tears would begin to flow.

It simply wasn't fun or in the spirit of the holiday. We decided we'd had enough!

Some years ago, we sat down with the children before the holiday and made a list with them of how we wanted to celebrate each night. We didn't completely get rid of presents, but we did feel better about what we were teaching our children.

Over the past decade we have had wonderful Chanukah celebrations and have created traditions that are now part of our family rituals – and no more tears! Here are eight of our favorite Chanukah happenings:

1. Friends and Fire Night

We build a big fire in the fireplace and invite friends over whose children are our children's friends. Then we plan a fun activity. One year, our children each got to make and eat a pie of their own design.

Another year, we covered the tables and had Art Night. The children painted murals and made figures out of clay. Now that they are teens, our kids get together and make a dinner for their friends.

2. Music Night

We invite friends over who play instruments and who like to sing. Then we spend the evening singing, playing dreidel games and eating latkes.

3. Tzedakah (Charity) Night

On this night we do something for others. When the children were small, we bought gifts to donate to a local seasonal toy campaign or sent money to the Jerusalem Post Toy Fund.

Now that they are older, we can serve dinner at a shelter or work at a food bank. These outings might be combined with another favorite, Movie Night, when the whole family goes to the movies together.

4. Big Present Night

We give each child one big present.

5. Book Night

When they were younger, we would buy each child a storybook and spend the evening reading the books out loud and telling Chanukah stories. Now, we buy the family a video we've all been wanting or a piece of software.

6. Tickets Night

We pick a cultural event such as a concert or a play we would like to attend as a family, and then we purchase the tickets.

7. Grandparents Night

We give the children the presents that came in the mail and get on the phone and talk to their grandparents and their cousins scattered around the country. If your family is closer, you could have a family party.

8. Homemade Presents Night

This is definitely our favorite night and has been consistently on our list from the beginning. We draw lots to decide who will make a present for which family member.

These presents are always treasured, no matter how simple or elaborate. My husband still keeps the bills in a box that our son decorated for that purpose when he was five. The year our daughter became a bat mitzvah, her older brother created a plaque with her invitation and pictures on it.

My son designed a menorah in the shape of a cat for his cousin who loves cats. My husband made comedy/tragedy masks out of papier mâché for our son, the thespian.

Lately, we have enjoyed creating elaborate Chanukah decorations for our home, both inside and out, in order to get back to a basic Chanukah mitzvah, which is to publicize the miracle.

The point is that long after store-bought presents have been broken or forgotten, our memories of family time at Chanukah remain.

GETTING TO KNOW YOU: Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak had their first face-to-face meeting last week in Istanbul, Turkey, where world leaders gathered for the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) conference. Canadian officials said "very good rapport" was established. The two discussed the Mideast peace process, and Barak said the Israeli trade minister would visit Canada next month. The Israeli PM also indicated that he had intervened to allow another month for discussions between El Al and Air Canada, which are in the middle of an air dispute.

Barak addresses GA

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

ATLANTA, Ga. — Israelis live "in a tough neighbourhood where there is no mercy and no second chance for the weak. Only a strong, self-confident Israel can enter a process of negotiations and make difficult, even painful decisions," said Israel's prime minister last Friday.

Speaking to North American Jewish leaders and other delegates at the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities, Ehud Barak focused strongly on the need for a continuing partnership between North American Jewry and Israel.

He expressed his regrets for not speaking in person, but rather via satellite hook-up from Manchester, England, where his plane had been damaged on the ground by a luggage carrier. Barak himself was not hurt. The plane had stopped to refuel en route from Turkey, where Barak attended summit talks.

The prime minister emphasized the importance of a secure peace for Israel.

His audience of 4,000 at the Atlanta Civic Centre – among them some 150 Canadians – applauded Barak's sole reference to Jerusalem, as "the one indivisible, eternal capital of Israel."

Stresses need for a strong Israel to face issues ahead

Barak expressed his gratitude for U.S. President Bill Clinton's role in the Mideast peace process and noted that world Jewry also has a critical role to play, having stood by Israel in times of war. "Today, to be pro-Israel is to be pro-peace," he said.

A comprehensive peace settlement will be safer for Israel and the rest of the world, he said.

A strong Israel, not facing the threat of imminent war, will be able to pursue other issues, he noted.

Barak refrained from making "unrealistic promises" on the issue of religious expression in Israel.

"But I do make this commitment: to engage in a dialogue, to hear your ideas and to raise these discussions to the highest level of debate," he said.

"I believe with all my heart that if we work together on tolerance and understanding, we will find a solution for every Jew to feel that he or she is a full partner in our Jewish life in Israel."

Cohen gets coveted award

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Matt Cohen, the Toronto-area writer who has steadily produced more than a dozen novels and about eight non-fiction books over the last three decades, has finally won the coveted Governor-General's award for English-language fiction for his latest novel, Elizabeth and After (published by Knopf Canada).

Reached in Ottawa one day after the awards ceremony at which he was handed a cheque for $10,000, Cohen said it had been "a great day and a wonderful ceremony…

Matt Cohen

"I'm very pleased to have won the award for this book. My publishers are very happy and my kids are very impressed."

Cohen had been nominated for the award twice before, most recently for his 1996 novel Last Seen, which Margaret Atwood called his "best novel to date."

Hezbollah warns of attacks on Israel

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC Welcomes Sentence

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, says it is "gratified" at the recent sentence handed to five white supremacists who were convicted in the murder of a 65-year-old Sikh caretaker. Judge William Stewart called the crime repugnant and clearly racially motivated, and meted out jail terms of between 12 and 15 years. Congress said it was encouraged that the judge sent a message by boosting the sentences because the crime was motivated by hatred.

Kashrut Flap Over

CALGARY — A controversy over kashrut at a local synagogue has been resolved. At a recent meeting, the board of Beth Tzedec Synagogue passed a resolution to open the shul's kitchen to the community, at the rabbi's discretion. This means the rabbi can allow the community's kashrut supervision agency, Calgary Kosher, or CK, the right to exercise its Orthodox standards in the synagogue's kitchen.

Expansion Plans I

WINNIPEG — Over 150 people gathered here to listen to plans for the expansion of Beth Israel Synagogue. The plans call for seating for 1,200, a larger social hall, a day care and a Hebrew School. The estimated cost for the project is $2 million.

Expansion Plans II

VICTORIA — Temple Emanu-El is taking the first steps in its expansion plans. The synagogue has launched a campaign dubbed Matanah Gedolah (big gift) to raise money for the construction of a social and educational centre, to be built on land next to the temple, where portable classrooms are now located. Plans call for new classrooms, offices and eventually, additional floors.

ISRAEL

MKs Call for Probe

JERUSALEM — Eleven members of the Knesset last week submitted a bill that would require the attorney general to open a criminal investigation into former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The initiative comes on the heels of the fraud investigation currently under way of Netanyahu and his wife, Sara.

Cancel Meet: China

JERUSALEM — China has asked the speaker of the Knesset to cancel his scheduled meeting later this month with the Dalai Lama, warning it could hurt Jerusalem's growing ties with Beijing. But the speaker, Avraham Burg, said there is no reason the meeting should be interpreted as conveying an anti-China message.

Goldstein's Grave

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court has upheld the army's decision to tear down a shrine at the grave of a Jewish settler who in 1994 killed 29 Muslims praying at Hebron's Tomb of the Patriarchs. The judges said keeping the shrine to Baruch Goldstein would send a message of praise for the crime.

WORLD

Israel Blamed for Crash

CAIRO — An Egyptian newspaper is blaming Israel for the recent crash of EgyptAir Flight 990. "I am certain that Israel's fingers are not far away," the editor of the opposition paper Al Wafd wrote in a front-page column.

UN 'Racist' on Israel

UNITED NATIONS — Israel's treatment at the United Nations amounts to "racism," says the U.S. ambassador to the UN. Richard Holbrooke made the comment last week at a dinner hosted by the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. Citing Israel's exclusion from all UN regional groups and the annual anti-Israel resolutions brought forward, Holbrooke said the only explanation is "a deep, subliminal, but undeniable hostility."

Apology I

VIENNA — Austrian far-right leader Jorg Haider last week apologized for sympathetic statements he has made about Adolf Hitler and the SS. In a speech here, he said his remarks "were certainly insensitive or open to misunderstanding," and told Austrian Jews that they should not be afraid of his party, which came in second in elections last month.

Apology II

MADRID — Spanish priests, monks and nuns have apologized for the role their forebears played in the Inquisition. The move by the president of the Conference of Spanish Religious Workers came after the Roman Catholic church made similar apologies for past sins.

Warsaw Rabbi Quits

WARSAW — The rabbi serving Warsaw's Jewish community last week resigned just six months into his two-year appointment. Citing conflict with community leaders, Rabbi Baruch Rabinowicz said, "Neither side fulfilled the expectations they had." Rabbi Rabinowicz took up his post last May as the first rabbi to be hired by the community in at least four decades.

Troubling Social Statistics Released

JERUSALEM — An estimated 417,000 children in Israel live below the poverty line – a fourfold increase over 20 years – according to a government study reported last week.

The study was released one da ' after the employment bureau reported that 166,789 people were jobless October, a new record.

The figures reflect a 3.6 percent increase in unemployment since June, a month before Prime Minister Ehud Barak took office.

Barak's campaign promise to help the disadvantaged was recently called into question by a month-long strike by disabled Israelis seeking more public assistance.

The statistics were released amid the surprise resignation announcement by the governor of the Bank of Israel, Jacob Frenkel.

His resignation challenges Barak to name a successor whose policies will be in line with the prime minister's pledge to spur economic growth and employment.

"All of these years, we hear the statistics," Israel's leading child welfare advocate, Esther Luvohinsky, told Israel Radio. "But no solutions are offered for the problems."

Community says goodbye to slain teen

Youngsters blanket grave with flowers

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dmitri (Matti) Baranovski was buried on a blustery, bitterly cold day last week, three days after he was beaten to death in a north Toronto park. He would have been 16 in December.

His grave in Pardes Shalom Cemetery in Maple was blanketed with flowers brought by many of the hundreds of youngsters who came to say goodbye. Someone left a teddy bear.

Over 700 people attended the funeral: fellow students at Northview Heights Secondary School, three busloads full, as well as those packed into private cars; members of the Jewish Russian community; representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress and of Toronto City Council; and people from the general Jewish community, who did not necessarily know Baranovski or his family, but just felt they wanted to be there.

Rabbi Ron Weiss, director of chaplaincy for Jewish Family & Child Service, recognized that right now there can be no consolation for the family. We can only weep with them, he said.

Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman, rabbi of the Jewish Russian Community Centre, described Baranovski's kindness and compassion both to his mother and to his friends. Baranovski wanted to be a doctor, he said, because it was a way to help others. He was a mentsh, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

The issue, the rabbi said, was what will come out of our shock and sadness. He had two suggestions: that schools should start every day with a moment of silent prayer or meditation, and that people should perform "random acts of kindness and goodness" to overcome the random act of violence that cut short the youngster's life.

"We must strive to be better husbands, better wives, better children, better parents, better friends," he said.

Rabbi Zaltzman announced that the city had promised to erect a menorah in Baranovski's memory at the place where he was killed. The hope is to have it up by this year's Chanukah, he said.

The menorah is an apt memorial, since Baranovski's Hebrew name, Mattityahu, is the same as the first leader of the Maccabees.

An emotional Councillor Mike Feldman brought condolences from Toronto City Council and from Mayor Mel Lastman, who was attending a conference in Florida.

Dmitri (Matti) Baranovski

Five friends, shaking, yet showing great dignity, gave brief eulogies in English, Russian and Hebrew.

Afterwards, two of the boys hugged Baranovski's mother, who fiercely returned the embrace.

Perhaps the most poignant memories of that day will be vignettes at the cemetery: Baranovski's mother, white-faced, being supported by relatives, trying to control her tears as the plain wood coffin was lowered into the ground; men sobbing as they filled in the grave; the teenagers, crying, or hugging, or staring at the grave, and standing there, just standing, in a final tribute; the photographers from the media, who co-operated with cemetery officials and stood well back from the grave, so as not to intrude on the mourners' grief.

Matti Baranovski was born in Kharkov, in Ukraine. His mother brought him to Israel when he was six, and a little over two years ago, to Canada.

Ironically, according to reports, they came to Canada to get away from the violence in Israel.

Northview Heights, his school, kept the flag at half-staff in his honour.

While he lived with his mother and stepfather, he was close to his father, stepmother and half-brother.

He is survived by his mother, Olga, father Vitaly Baranovsky, stepfather Elliott Korczak, stepmother Lilia Baranovski and half-brother Daniel.

Rabbi Zaltzman said the family hopes to establish a scholarship in Dmitri Baranovski's name.

While there had been no arrest as of the time this article went to press, the police said they have several leads. A member of the Jewish Russian community has offered a reward of $15,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible.

Justice at closer reach

Ever since Charles Dickens wrote that "the law is an ass," people have tended to agree with him. Primarily, they did so because he had a point.

In his descriptively aphoristic manner, Dickens succinctly encapsulated the layman's view of the legal system. He of course wrote in the mid-19th century when people could be sent to prison for failing to pay a debt. Debtors' prison has been abolished since then; but, were he alive today, he would likely record the very same observation.

Generally speaking, the man-on-the-street regards the legal system with emotions that range between fear and loathing. It is seen by most as a sort of tangled web in whose sticky filaments one must never ever become entangled.

The main reason for this view of the system is due to the method it holds out for resolving disputes, namely, the adversarial process. Each party to a dispute, civil or criminal, hires a lawyer to protect his or her rights. The parties are adversaries. They are opponents in an arena of legal battle, the waging of which is conducted by highly trained legal "warriors."

The theory underlying our dispute resolution system is that the best, most effective manner for winnowing the truth out of a hodgepodge chaff of conflicting allegations of fact is by letting the adversaries' expert warriors – the lawyers – joust it out in court.

Is it any wonder, then, that most ordinary folks fear the prospect of having to go to court? Most people try to avoid battles.

In the first place, the procedure is not pleasant. Being cross-examined is not a nice way to pass the time. The opposing lawyer has one objective regarding your testimony: to discredit it. And there are only two ways of doing that, namely, by proving that you were either dishonest and therefore a liar, or not necessarily dishonest but seriously mistaken and therefore unreliable, nevertheless. One rarely feels good at the prospect of being cross-examined.

In the second place, hiring a lawyer usually costs a great deal of money. In an era when legal aid is rarely available for parties to civil disputes, a large number of people simply prefer not to "bother" entering the arena.

Thus the notion that the legal system is indeed an "ass," finds fertile soil and takes root among "ordinary folk." The system is intimidating, expensive and confusing. Justice would be nice, litigants are told, but "justice with costs" would be nicer.

In Judaism, the resolution of disputes was always regarded as a necessary and sacrosanct part of communal life because its objective, namely, the doing of justice, was viewed as sacrosanct in and of itself. Indeed our tradition emphasizes that justice is one of God's attributes, that the sublime/pragmatic notion of justice underpins the very foundation of the world.

Abraham, our patriarch, dared to reproach God for his plan to destroy Sodom without first ascertaining if any just men would perish with the wicked. "Will you sweep away the righteous with the wicked? Shall not the judge of all the earth act justly?"

After the exodus from Egypt, Moses is enjoined by his father-in-law to establish a judicial system for the smooth, efficient resolution of disputes among the recently liberated slaves. And he does.

The dispensing of justice among quarrelling individuals was regarded from the earliest moments of our nationhood, and has been ever since, as a high, uncompromisable societal and personal, moral obligation.

It was therefore both refreshingly creative and palpably beneficial to members of the community that the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region last month created The Jewish Mediation Services of Ontario (JMSO).

The initiative by CJC is an attempt to bring justice within closer reach of "ordinary" people embroiled in a dispute. It is an attempt to make dispute resolution less intimidating, less expensive and less confusing.

The JMSO is an entirely voluntary process. As described in the notice that was sent to rabbis and synagogue lay leadership across Ontario, it is "a confidential, alternative dispute resolution program which seeks to facilitate dialogue and negotiated solutions to conflicts of a Jewish nature." Matrimonial disputes or disputes stemming from interpretations of Halachah do not form part of the JMSO's mandate.

The chair of the JMSO is Sharon Wolfe.

The success of the CJC initiative will depend on the willingness of quarrelling individuals to take their disputes to the JMSO. That in turn will depend on the experiences of the "litigants," on the dignity of the process, on whether the parties will be able to emerge from a JMSO mediation without feeling that they have "lost."

To try to ensure such a result, Wolfe points out that an "exceptional" roster of dispute resolution mediators has been assembled by the JMSO. The approach of the mediators will be governed by the overarching philosophy that was the lifelong, consistent teaching of our ancient sages: "All Israel is responsible for one another."

By establishing the JMSO, the CJC has, in effect, coupled the rabbinic instruction with God's imperative: "Justice, justice shall you pursue."

In doing so, they are trying to enable the better fulfillment of both instructions in the lives of "ordinary" folks. The CJC is to be commended.

Aliyah from former Soviet Union on the rise

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Continuing turmoil in the former Soviet Union (FSU), with no signs of improvement, is contributing to the highest levels of aliyah in eight years, says the head of the Jewish Agency for Israel's Russian unit.

If current trends continue, 65,000 Jews from the FSU, half from Russia alone, are expected to arrive in Israel in 1999, says Alla Levy, who was here for a series of briefings for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Jewish emigration from the FSU is up 42 percent over last year, and represents 20 percent more arrivals than the Jewish Agency had estimated for this year, Levy told The CJN.

Immigrants from Russia alone are expected to reach 33,000 this year, an increase of 130 percent over 1998, and 67 percent more than was forecast.

They're the highest aliyah levels since 1990-91.

More and more Jews are leaving because of anti-Semitism, said Levy, who is based in Moscow and heads a team of 35 Israeli shlichim (emissaries) and hundreds of local Russians who promote aliyah and teach Jewish culture and religion.

Questionnaires would-be immigrants filled out in previous years showed only negligible concern over anti-Semitism. The top reason for wanting to leave was concern for children, far ahead of political instability. Anxiety over anti-Semitism was registered by just four percent of respondents, Levy explained.

Now, worry over political instability is the number 1 reason for leaving. Fear of anti-Semitism, meanwhile, has shot up to 31 percent of respondents.

"Even Russian analysts says Russian anti-Semitism is a virus," said Levy, who left Moscow for Israel in 1970. "It's always there; it's just a question of how close it is to the surface.

"I myself am a product of anti-Semitism. My Jewish identity developed only as a result of anti-Semitism."

Levy said she can't recall anti-Semitism as open and as violent as it is now in Russia. She said the situation could worsen, depending on the outcome of parliamentary elections next month.

The country, as well as the entire FSU, is still feeling the effects of Russia's financial meltdown of August 1998. "It's absolute chaos," Levy said, adding that the unsettled conditions in Russia have triggered higher Jewish emigration from Ukraine and the Caucasus.

Proportionally, though, the highest number of Russian-Jewish emigres hail not from the large cities, but from Birobidzhan, the far-east territory once referred to as the Soviet Union's "Jewish Autonomous Region."

Jewish math

Levy said some 2,000 Jews from the region have left in the past 10 months. Two years ago, the Jewish population of the area was estimated at 8,000. In all, 3,000 have left.

Today, the Jewish Agency says there are as many as 12,000 Jews in Birobidzhan. "That's Jewish math," Levy said. "Many of them are mixed families."

Levy said the entire Jewish community in Chechnya – some 1,200 people – was rescued by Israel during the last war with Russia in 1994-96. She said the Jewish Agency has, however, tracked down a 17-year-old Jewish girl living in an orphanage in Ingushetia, a breakaway region within Chechnya. The girl, apparently, didn't know she was Jewish.

As for neighbouring Dagestan, the estimated 5,000 Jews are far from the current fighting between Russian troops and Chechen rebels, but the community "is under constant risk."

During the first half of this year, about 65 Jews left the mainly Muslim Dagestan for Israel each month, but emigration has levelled off. The Jewish Agency maintains an emissary in the capital, Makhachkala.

The Jewish Agency, with a budget of $376 million (US) for next year, oversees rescue, immigration and absorption of Jews, and promotes Jewish education overseas.

Forty-three percent of funds raised for the United Jewish Appeal here goes to the Jewish Agency.

Shalom-K Tours lawsuit called 'frivolous'

TORONTO — The president of Peerless Travel Inc., Ehud Telem, says a $50-million lawsuit brought against him and El Al is "frivolous" and without merit.

The lawsuit was launched last month by Shalom-K Tours Inc., which earlier this month was declared bankrupt by an Ontario court (CJN, Nov. 18).

It is now up to the court-appointed trustee to decide whether to proceed with the suit.

Shalom-K was declared bankrupt after the court found that the agency did not have sufficient funds in its trust account to cover money owed.

One affidavit said there was a $707,328 shortfall in Shalom-K's trust account.

Court documents show that the agency, which specialized in trips to Israel, owed El Al $688,000 and Air Canada more than $25,000 for tickets it had sold.

Telem said he doesn't know why he was named in the suit, launched on behalf of Shalom-K by its founder, Shalom Even. "I have no idea how he picked my name," Telem said.

The lawsuit alleges breach of contract, conspiracy and interference with economic relations.

Last week, Shalom-K creditors met for the first time. Five of them were appointed inspectors to ensure that other creditors' interests are protected.

The five inspectors are representatives of El Al; Revenue Canada; the International Air Travel Association (IATA), which pursued the bankruptcy action on behalf of the airlines; the Travel Industry Council of Ontario (TICO), which monitors the travel industry in Ontario and has compensated some of Shalom-K's clients; and a lawyer representing a former Shalom-K employee.

Developmentally disabled have 'right' to privacy

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To prevent sexual victimization, it is necessary to teach people with developmental disabilities that they have the right to privacy, said Dave Hingsburger at a conference celebrating Reena's 25th anniversary.

"People out there believe we own their bodies, their souls; we own them," said Hingsburger, a consultant and lecturer on sexuality and disability issues.

Disabled people often aren't taught that they have the right to say no to unwanted touching, he said.

By age 18, women with developmental disabilities have an 80 percent chance of having been raped or abused, said Hingsburger, citing statistics from the book, Violence and Abuse in the Lives of People With Disabilities: End of Silent Acceptance?

For men, there is a 40 to 60 percent chance, he said at the conference organized by Reena, a social service agency that integrates developmentally disabled adults into mainstream society.

"For most people with disabilities, their first experience with sexualization will be victimization," he said.

The abuse often is not reported because they do not "know the rules," he said, because people with disabilities often don't know they have been violated.

A high proportion of sexual abusers are people in caregiving roles, he said, and later pointed out that staff at group homes hold tremendous power over residents.

After Hingsburger discussed this issue of power at a conference in the United States, he said, an attendee wrote him an angry letter disagreeing that staff have extensive power over residents.

The man, who worked in a group home, later wrote Hingsburger again, saying he had conducted an experiment to test his power in the group home.

He asked a resident to touch a hot stove. The resident began to tremble but did not say no.

When the man commanded him again, more forcefully, to touch the stove, the resident's hand began moving towards it.

People with developmental disabilities learn "100 times per week" that when they do say no, it means they will be forced to do what they objected to anyway, Hingsburger said.

To be able to say no, he said, people have to have a healthy self-concept.

He gave an example of a friend with cerebral palsy who had developed a positive self-esteem. She told Hingsburger that if God came down and said he'd give her the ability to walk, she'd say, "No way, I like the way you made me the first time around."

"Isn't that difficult to hear? That a person with a disability is happy being the person they are?" Hingsburger asked.

"When a person with a disability says, 'I'm happy being who I am,' we think they are mentally ill," he said, half-jokingly.

He injected this kind of light humour into the presentation several times.

"Has anyone said to you: 'I've seen some of your people downtown'?" he asked the mixed audience of social service staff, parents and educators.

"Look at them and say, 'I'm not Moses; they're not my people.' "

Hingsburger also spoke about other rights and needs of people with developmental disabilities.

One important need for people with disabilities is to have "15 minutes of undivided attention," he said.

Often, those who take care of or interact with disabled people are too busy to sit down without distractions and give their undivided attention, he said.

"I think we give the message that we don't care – I've got important paper work to do so shut up."

And when he cried, what did they hear?

Bullies and thugs are cowards; they have the "courage" to prey upon or harm only smaller, weaker, more vulnerable individuals. But they do submit themselves to the possibility of retribution. Bullies and thugs who hide their faces behind balaclavas and bandannas are repulsive cowards; they lack even that false, self-deluding, pathetic, puny "courage," preferring to pummel their victims while evading any possibility of personal risk.

Such were the murderers of 15-year-old Dmitri Baranovski: repulsive cowards, a swarm of young adults, a conscienceless mass of evil-doers who hid their faces from the frightened, confused youngster even as they kicked and punched him to death in a small park, in suburban north Toronto last week.

When he cried out to them, undoubtedly pleading for his life, what did they hear? Did they hear the pleas of mercy from a fellow human being? Did they hear Dmitri gasping for air? Did they hear his moans of pain? Did they hear his young life expiring?

Who are these people that they heard nothing but the sounds of their own amusement?

Our revulsion and our anger at this outrage, however, must be only the beginning points in our search for answers.

Our search must indeed lead us to a point that includes justice; but it dare not stop there. The incidence of teenage-related, gang violence are too frequent now for us, as a society, not to be worried.

We must, of course, never absolve these murderers – any murderers – of their culpability, or look to find "justifications" for their unjustifiable behaviour. But there are larger societal issues involved in the circumstances that led to Dmitri Baranovski's murder.

What are the predominant influences shaping the values of our youth today? We do not judge or measure the law-abiding, decent majority by the behaviours of the aberrant minority. But what size, truly, is that minority? And what is leading them toward such cruel and violent behaviour?

In an "advanced" society such as ours, increasingly dominated by machines, are the influences for goodness strong enough to counterbalance the impact on our youth of the daily drumbeat of videos, electronics and other high-tech diversions?

Where, even, do we look for those influences in an "advanced," free and democratic society, such as ours? We must look, first, where we have always looked: to the sustaining environment of a positive, healthy family structure nurtured with deference and purpose by the traditional symbiosis between home and school.

Of late, however, that symbiosis has suffered from severe strain; and the family structure has been weakened as a result. Both home and school are under a great deal of pressure, primarily but not exclusively, financial. As a society, we must relieve that pressure.

And our governments must pay heed for they have an important role to play if we are to ensure, when victims like Dmitri Baranovski, Jonathan Wamback or Reena Verk cry out, their cries will be heard; or better still, that there never again will be such victims.

Jews owned homes before 1919

Your article on 42 St. George St. (CJN, Nov. 11) is factually incorrect.

There must have been hundreds of homes owned by Jews before 1919. The Frankels and the Smuels lived in grand homes on Jarvis Street. The Singer family owned three homes on Kendal Avenue.

I was born at 80 Howland Ave. in 1911 in a home my grandfather, a Charles King, bought in 1907.

No Polish labour camps

The undersigned has asked The CJN to print this letter sent to Brian Predoe, chair, Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto.

Re: 19th Annual Holocaust Education Week. It is with great sadness that we bring to your attention a terrible injustice done to the Polish people as a whole. We do not understand how you can hope to foster constructive Christian-Jewish dialogue when such destructive information is provided to the general public.

We refer to page 10 of the brochure, wherein we read (at the 8 p.m. Oct. 29 session) about a woman's survival in "the Warsaw Ghetto and several Polish labour camps." The statement is grossly misleading and is, in fact, a lie. There were no Polish labour camps. Poland was attacked by Germany. The terrible things that happened to the Jews happened in occupied Poland. The main victims were both Polish and Jewish. To allege that the Poles were in any way responsible for the Holocaust is an outrage.

One has to wonder why the Jewish community as a whole fails to educate the general public as to why there were so many Jews in Poland? The answer is simple. Poland was a tolerant country. When Jews were expelled elsewhere, there were no barriers to their flourishing in Poland. One also has to wonder why the Jewish community as a whole fails to educate the general public as to who forms the greatest percentage (by nation) recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations.

We are dismayed that the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto endorses the above type of "education."

J.B.'s party label omitted

Re: "Toronto laneway named for J.B." (CJN, Nov. 11). Notwithstanding the fact that many people liked Salsberg, he did in fact represent the area in the provincial legislature as a communist, and was a significant figure in the Communist party.

I believe that when someone reviews Salsberg's history, this communist connection, albeit in the distant past, should not be ignored.

Friends of Berlin family

Further to Sheldon Kirshner's "Portrait of a great philosopher" (CJN, Nov. 4), which I enjoyed reading, I feel the following may be of interest to your readers.

The Berlin family were lifelong friends of my family, first in Riga and then in London. My aunt, Bella Sebba (nee Schalit), passed away in Israel two years ago. My cousin in England – Iris Sebba – took it upon herself to publish two times a year a magazine for family and friends in Bella Sebba's memory called the Bella Times, to which family and friends contribute reminiscences of Bella as well as family news.

Hidden in France

I was hidden in Romans-sur-Isère in southern France as a child from 1943 until the end of the war. Are you among the child survivors who were hidden in the area during the war? Perhaps you stayed with one of the rescuers, including the courageous Mme Chesneau, a disabled woman who reportedly hid about 140 children at the Château de Payrins. She was one of the first French women to be honoured as a Righteous Gentile by the State of Israel.

If you are one of the hidden children of Romans and surrounding area, I would like to hear from you.

On the Shloshim

'A walking kiddush HaShem'

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

They came by the thousands to his funeral; they came by the thousands to the house of shivah, to express their grief at the passing of their former chief rabbi but constant leader.

His death was not sudden, and yet it was sudden. Those of us privileged to be part of the family of HaRav Reb Yisrael Jakobovits, known to the larger world as Lord Immanuel Jakobovits, were aware that he was not in the best of health.

In the past few years, his peripheral vision had become compromised after a stroke, and his manner of walking had veered toward being somewhat unsteady. But his vision for his people was as clear as ever, his approach to communal issues as steady as usual, and his energy, as always, seemingly endless.

He had just returned from a trip to North America where he spoke in several cities. On the day he died, he was scheduled to visit Paris as head of a delegation asking France's Prime Minister Jacques Chirac to intercede on behalf of the 13 Jews unjustly imprisoned in Iran. A few days later, he was to be honoured by the Lord Mayor of London as one of 300 Britons whose high achievements during this century were considered worthy of tribute.

There was, in other words, lots of unfinished business on Lord Jakobovits' agenda, but that would have been the case no matter when he died. This was because his concern for his people, and for the crucial issues faced by the world community, never abated.

As his devoted and cherished wife, Lady Amelie Jakobovits, remarked at the shivah, he never retired. He just moved into a different phase of activity.

That he was on the way to entreat on behalf of the 13 Jews in Iran comes as no surprise to anyone who knows how my uncle lived, and what were his abiding concerns.

He was the first western rabbi to visit Refuseniks in the former Soviet Union, and was a staunch advocate on behalf of Soviet Jewry. He travelled far and wide on behalf of his people. I cannot think of a Jewish community anywhere that was not blessed by his presence.

In spite of the oceanic distance that separated us, I was able to see my uncle quite frequently. Looking back, I value so much the wisdom he shared, the dignity he projected, the warmth he exuded, the passion for what was correct that inspired everything he did.

My uncle never floated an opinion as a trial balloon, or to stir controversy. He only said what he meant and he meant what he said. He did stir controversy, because he never towed the party line. But he also never towed an anti-party line.

He was not predictably liberal or conservative. He was predictably honest, forthright, even vigorous in presenting his case, and fervently committed to what was best for all people. He did not look for issues on which to stand out in opposition, but he never shirked from the responsibility to say what needed to be said, even if the consequences were clearly to be an avalanche of harsh criticism thrown his way.

He had a profound commitment to the poor and underprivileged, but his approach to their plight did not conform to a political agenda. It conformed to what he thought was the most effective way for the poor to be elevated from their plight.

Even in the calm confines of his study or his living room or his kitchen, when issues of importance came up for discussion, the pitch in his voice went up a few notches. Away from the scene, he could never detach from the passion that he retained for communal matters. It was not anger in the higher pitched voice; it was unabating concern.

At family occasions, the happy, and thank God there were many, and the sad, which in a large family are hardly avoidable, he was always asked to speak. It was not only because of his honoured position in the community. It was because he had an uncanny knack for saying the right thing at the right time, and for being able to turn a phrase or a quote and make it so uniquely applicable to the occasion. And this he did at all times in his exhausting string of public speeches, both when he was chief rabbi and when he was chief rabbi emeritus.

He was the father of Jewish medical ethics as we know it today. He came from a background that integrated medicine and Halachah, and his treatise, Jewish Medical Ethics, was the first comprehensive treatment of the major ethical challenges posed by modern medicine.

Even today, it is hardly possible to venture forth on any topic within the medical ethics spectrum, be it on matters of abortion, autopsy, transplant, birth control, in vitro fertilization, or whatever, without making reference to this work. He was, in this and in so many other facets of his life, ahead of the times, simply because he was so clued in to our timeless tradition.

His bearing was always regal. In the privacy of his home he dressed immaculately, and he never uttered a harsh word or made a remark that an eavesdropping reporter could have transmitted in a disparaging way. He respected everyone, and all issues, even when no one was around. He lived his entire life according to the famous imperative that "we should be in awe of Heaven in private and in public."

Believe it or not, my uncle was fundamentally a shy person, but he did not shy away from the responsibilities that came his way, including arguing strenuously and eloquently, to all of Great Britain, for a stronger commitment to family values.

Even though he grew up in the dark shadows of the Holocaust, and was keenly aware of the destruction that was wrought on Jewish posterity, that did not deter him from expressing his strong unease with the proliferation of physical monuments to the Holocaust at the expense of a more meaningful monument by way of a vibrant regeneration of Jewishness via Jewish education.

Indeed, Jewish education was at the centre of my uncle's passions. He worked determinedly to re-energize the education-al system in England, again in face of, but undeterred by opposition. The fruits of his labours, in terms of more schools and more children being educated, are an endearing and enduring legacy.

And he argued most convincingly that the religious parties in Israel missed the boat, going back to the re-establishment of the state, in asking for control of the religious ministry instead of asking to guide the education ministry – a colossal mistake which, had it been avoided, might have forestalled both the secular-religious divide in Israel and the great erosion of Jewishness presently unfolding in Israel.

Lord Jakobovits accepting the Templeton award in Toronto in 1991.

His moment of greatest travail was when he openly questioned Israel's policy in the territories. He was always a passionate lover of Israel, but he was deeply committed to the mentsch-Yisrael idea of his mentor, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch. He wanted Israel to personify mentschlichkeit, both individually and collectively. He wanted Israel's behaviour to be rooted in the Torah notion of ultimate respect.

He fervently desired that Israel's conduct be a kiddush HaShem, a sanctification of God's name, and he suffered when this was not the case. His call in this direction was not made without due deliberation. For all the uproar that he caused, no one who knew my uncle could accuse him of opportunism, or lack of feeling for his people. His cry from the heart emanated from his unyielding love of Israel and his confidence that the State of Israel should and could be a model of what is right even in the most trying of circumstances.

His opponents, on this or other issues, knew that they were contending with a man who was intellectually well informed and thought his ideas out, and was spiritually motivated by the purest and most profoundly genuine ultimate concerns. He wanted for us that we never deviate from being what we should be. He never lost sight of the big picture even when it was tempting and enticing to do so.

Inside the family, we saw a side of him that may have escaped the grasp of many. He was a remarkably humble man. He went from a meeting with the Queen or the prime minister to comparatively ordinary activities with no swelled head or trace of hubris.

He carefully guarded all matters that were confidential, and never gloated about being the adviser to the prime minister, Margaret Thatcher, who described him after his passing as "one of the century's most remarkable spiritual leaders."

His life was an unbroken line of dedication, commitment, passion for his people, and allegiance to God and God's word, the Torah. He had the immense blessing of a wife, our Aunt Amelie, may she continue to be well, who was as one with him in all he did, and who possesses an amazing amalgam of energy and effervescence that so beautifully complemented and complimented her husband.

All his children and grandchildren have carried on, in their unique ways, the dedication to community that they lived on a daily basis in their formative years.

My uncle had the crown of Torah learned and promulgated, the crown of knighthood, the crown of peerage, the crown of great honours bestowed, including the Templeton Prize for Religion, but most important of all, he had the crown of a shem tov, a good, noble, respected name that transcends his passing.

As an uncle, I loved him. As a rabbi, I respected him. As chief rabbi, I admired him. As an international leader, I was in awe of him. The rabbis who were privileged to work with him were so naturally inspired by him. He was, and will always be, the rabbi's rabbi; or, as they affectionately called him – the Chief.

If I had to describe his life in a single sentence, it would be that he was, in all that he did, privately and publicly, a walking kiddush HaShem, a man who made all of us feel that much better about who we are, primarily because of who he was and what he represented.

Opinions

Bored with doing good?

A few years ago, the whole issue of ecology, and the protection of the environment, was much talked about. Jewish activists were in the forefront of the movement, and not by accident. Taking care of God's gifts and the principle of bal tashchit (do not destroy, or do not waste) are firmly entrenched in our tradition.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

But somehow this area of concern has slipped from the consciousness of many, and if it were not for a minority that insists on reminding us of our obligations to the world in which we live, it would be altogether overlooked. Sometimes that leads me to surmise that perhaps we are getting bored with doing good. Nonetheless, I will remind you of issues that yesterday were taken for granted.

This rather lengthy introduction arises from the receipt of a fascinating brochure that was mailed to me by the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life (COEJL).

Hiding behind this title is a group of Jewish institutions that range across the spectrum of organized North American Jewish life, from the American Jewish Committee to Congress and B'nai Brith; from traditional religious institutions to the most liberal. On paper, it should be the most successful organization of our community. Maybe someday it will be, but for the time being I need to describe its purposes, with the hope that you, too, may once again become interested in this issue.

The questions that COEJL asks are fundamental, almost simplistic: Since we all know there is an environmental crisis and that a heavy cloud of pollutants hangs over every one of our major cities, what are we as individuals doing to decrease blight? Nothing is exempt from such considerations, whether it concerns our food, fuel or whatever. Are we using disposables, leaving lights on unnecessarily, over-utilizing our air-conditioning, or driving a car when it is not necessary and we could take public transportation? A strict Jewish environmentalist would say that all these issues fall under the rubric of bal tashchit.

The little pamphlet I received is entitled Caring for the Cycle of Life: Creating Environmentally Sound Life Cycle Celebrations. The booklet lists the opportunities that we have – whenever we celebrate a simchah – to lessen the damage to the environment and suggestions for how we can contribute to its betterment.

Meanwhile the Great Lakes are suffering, including Lake Ontario; arable land is disappearing; suburban sprawl is increasing; and our automobiles spew dirt into the air, which becomes less and less breathable. As someone who lives with controlled asthma, I am much aware of this particular problem.

So, what do I suggest? Get some information from local pro-environmental organizations like Pollution Probe or write for the booklet to which I have referred, addressing your enquiry to COEJL, 443 Park Avenue South, 11th Floor, New York 10016-7322. It may cost you a couple of dollars, but it is more than worth it.

We have to regain our sense of awareness of this oppressive problem, else the heritage we leave to our children's children will indeed be unclean in its most literal sense.

Two solitudes inside Israel

One of the striking developments in the current Knesset is the growing assertiveness of its Arab members. In a society and Parliament that have been described as "multicultural" and "sectorized" after the last election, representatives of the Arab minority (18 percent of Israel's citizens) are staking their claim for an Israel that will be a "state for all its citizens." In practice, they would prefer to do away with many of the Jewish symbols and character that are important to most Israeli Jews from a cultural perspective.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Relations between Israel's Jewish majority and its Arab minority have always been strained. While Israeli Arabs have generally been loyal to the state, Jewish Israelis question this loyalty. When several Israeli Arabs were involved in terrorist attacks in northern Israel earlier this fall, Israeli Jews were skeptical towards the condemnations by Arab leaders.

Public opinion polls taken at the time demonstrated a consistently negative attitude towards the Arab minority on the part of the Jewish majority. Most of those polled believed that if a Palestinian state would be established, Israeli Arabs would be more loyal to it than to the State of Israel.

This atmosphere of suspicion also influences Israelis' attitudes towards civil rights for their Arab fellow citizens. Many Israeli Jews objected when an Arab MK was recently appointed to the Knesset foreign affairs and security committee for the first time in the Knesset's history. A majority of those polled last September believed that Arabs should not enjoy equal political and civil rights, even as they supported the principle of equal economic rights for Arab citizens of the state. Clearly, for most Israelis, the issue is one not just of security, but of the Arabs' integration in the state at the expense of its Jewish character. Over 60 percent of those polled believed that Arabs were not integrated, and approximately 50 percent said they were opposed to such integration in principle.

In the historic tension between Israel as a Jewish state and as a democracy, a majority of Israelis – whether religious or secular – are prepared to compromise some democratic principles in order to preserve a preferential position for Jewish Israelis. Given the strength of feelings on the issue, it is unlikely that even progress in the peace process will substantially change these attitudes.

For their part, Israel's Arab citizens are better educated, more organized and more vocal in their demands than ever before. Their disenchantment with their political representatives and their frustration with broken promises and unfulfilled expectations has spawned a proliferation of non-profit community groups that are active in service delivery and advocacy. Some view this phenomenon as a sign of growing sophistication and another stage in the evolution of Israeli civil society. Others view it as a worrisome development, reminiscent of the Jewish yishuv's prestate organization, that may lead to a demand for autonomy by Israel's Arabs. In such a scenario, these organizations may become the nucleus for self-government. Since most Arabs are concentrated in the Galilee region, such a demand could have territorial implications as well.

Arab leadership is divided on this issue. The majority among them views this trend as a sign of simultaneous frustration and sophistication. They blame the government for the gap in allocation of resources and for regulations that discriminate against Arabs on issues such as land ownership. They reject the notion of autonomy and call for greater integration of Arabs into the mainstream of Israeli life. Others, led by Dr. Azmi Bishara, an eloquent intellectual and MK, believe that autonomy is a necessary, inevitable answer to Israel's self-definition as a Jewish state.

Israeli governments have never included an Arab minister. After the last election, despite pressure from the civil rights community to appoint an Arab member to his cabinet, Prime Minister Barak resisted, probably to demonstrate his appeal to the centre of the political map. He finally responded to the wave of media criticism by appointing an Arab to the Knesset foreign affairs and security committee, and one as deputy minister.

The (Jewish) minister responsible for Arab affairs, Matan Vilnay of the Centre party, responds to the current challenge by reiterating his government's promise to reduce the gaps in education and social services for the Arab community.

The issue is obviously far more complex. It cuts to the heart of the character of the state, and its tolerance for a non-Jewish, Arab, minority in its midst. Many Arabs still feel that greater equality of opportunity and equity in resources are the key to coexistence, if not integration.

Israeli Jews may not be prepared to respond accordingly, even if the alternative is a growing demand for autonomy .

What is truth?

The concept of truth is dear to the heart of every professor. But what is absolute truth anyway? And does untruth in one area lead to untruths in others? The world of scholarship has been roiled with several recent debates on just these issues. It has become commonplace for believers in relativism and post-modernism to argue that there has never been and can never be any objective, absolute truth. That may well be true. But there are standards of scholarship that have developed over time that are probably worthy of some respect. We should be careful before tossing them out.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Dutch, the new biography of Ronald Reagan by Edmund Morris – listed as non-fiction in the New York Times – has rightly angered traditional historians. Morris, unable to penetrate into the inner core of Reagan's life and mind despite unprecedented access, decided to inject himself as a fictitious character into the narrative of an otherwise lifeless story. That might be bad enough as a plot device for an ostensible work of serious biography. But worse, Morris apparently made up phony sources and sprinkled these liberally into the references, to bedevil future scholars. I am waiting for clever undergraduates to start handing in term papers using similar approaches.

Two cases involving changing truths are of particular interest to the Jewish world. One involves the controversy over the Palestinian-American literary scholar Edward Said, and his allegedly repeated misrepresentation of his childhood as one taking place mainly in Jerusalem, from which he was uprooted in 1948. This version of his youth has allowed him to add a personal dimension to his pro-Palestinian advocacy over the past decades. According to an article published in Commentary, Said is a fraud. His youth was spent mainly in Cairo, and thus he was not really a refugee. Said's response is that he never actually claimed that he himself was a refugee, but that his extended family, based in Jerusalem, became refugees after 1948. Perhaps Said in his earlier autobiographical statements may have fudged that distinction.

Does any of this affect the veracity of Said's claims on behalf of Palestinians generally? It should not. One of the basic principles of academic work is that an argument should be evaluated on its own merit, and not based on the biography of the advocate, even if he deliberately fabricates his past. In this era of identity politics, it is often hard to divorce the scholar from his or her past. Said's link to the refugee experience gave his arguments added credibility.

But imagine the credibility if his arguments sympathetic to the Palestinian position had come from Israelis! This in fact is somewhat at issue in the second case of truth and revisionism. Here the issue is not shoddy research methods or outright falsehoods, but new and controversial interpretations of historic events, based on newly discovered evidence. New textbooks in Israeli schools for the first time now include materials designed to get Israeli Jews to see the conflict from the perspective of Palestinians. A column in the Jerusalem Post of Sept. 5 feared these books would "undermine the moral case for Zionism." Actually, if used properly they may strengthen it.

At the same time Israeli scholars like Benny Morris at Ben-Gurion University have published new versions of Israeli history, relying on recently released archival material. These challenge many Zionist myths, such as the fact that the Jews were terrible military underdogs in 1948, and that the Arab side never expressed any interest in a peace settlement. I suspect that these revisionist books will in turn spawn another set of academic responses aimed at rescuing or modifying basic Zionist interpretations. A new, better, balanced picture may well result. Historic truths are rarely static.

One awaits, sadly, revisionist reappraisals on the part of Arab scholars and textbook writers of their own particular view of Israeli-Arab history. It will be a long wait. There are still some truths which apparently do not change. In a recent public speech Mrs. Arafat, in the presence of Mrs. Clinton, accused Israel of deliberately poisoning the environment in the West Bank, leading to increasing cancer rates among Palestinians. This vicious, medieval slur is a modern form of a blood libel against the Jews. Who knows, if asked to substantiate her vile accusation, Mrs. Arafat may find sources as authentic as those used by Reagan's biographer Edmund Morris.

The Kirshner File

Communing with nature in Israel

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel is afflicted by the malady of overdevelopment. Much like Singapore or Hong Kong, Israel is gradually losing its precious green spaces and metamorphosing into a city state, a concrete, soul-destroying megalopolis. The process is particularly evident along the coastal plain, and, to a much lesser degree, in the Galilee and the Negev. Inexorably, Israel's greenery – the lungs of the country – is being bulldozed to accommodate housing estates, shopping centres and highways. It is a looming ecological disaster.

These thoughts occurred to me during a recent trip to Israel. Tired of the cacophony and pollution of Tel Aviv, I decided to break away. After reading a pamphlet entitled Israel Nature Trails, published by the Society for Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI), I was hooked. Flipping through the pages, I chose a three-day hiking trip to the Galilee and the Golan Heights (annexed by Israel in 1981). It sounded just right. I had never hiked in the Galilee or the Golan. So it was clearly an idea whose time had come.

I was the sole Canadian on the trip. All the others were Americans, a mixture of men and women, as well as a 13-year-boy who had been brought to Israel expressly for his bar mitzvah. On a muggy Tuesday morning, we met in front of SPNI's storefront office, a block away from Tel Aviv's shabby old central bus station, a symbol of hasty urban planning and decay in Israel.

The route to the Golan, captured by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War, took us past quaint Israeli-Arab villages set on terraces and through Tiberias, one of Palestine's four holy cities.

Driving out of Tiberias, a jumble of buildings facing the quiescent Sea of Galilee, we made for the Golan, a basalt plateau whose sombre, wide-open vistas appeal to claustrophobic Israelis fleeing congestion. Although populated by Druze villagers and Jewish settlers, the Golan feels almost empty.

Leaving the bus, we walked across parched yellow fields dotted with wild fennel and purple thorns. At a dramatic cliff in the Gamla Nature Reserve, we watched rare Griffon vultures coasting gracefully. Beyond the thickly-wooded ravine loomed the fertile Jezreel Valley, misty under a bright sun.

After a tour of a ruined Byzantine church, its interior open to the clear blue sky, we reached a lookout with a view of the ruins of Gamla. Known as the Masada of the north, Gamla was a Jewish settlement besieged by a Roman army under the command of Vespasian. It fell to the Romans in 30 days, but not before 4,000 of its Jewish defenders were killed and a further 5,000 committed suicide. After the Six Day War, Gamla was excavated by Israeli archeologists.

Gingerly dodging boulders, and walking past clumps of shady Mt. Tabor oaks on the sun-bleached savannah, we hiked down into a gorge dense with bushes, trees and flaming pink oleander shrubs. At the very bottom was a natural pool fed by a waterfall. Nirvana.

We spent the night at the Tel Hai guest house and youth hostel, dedicated last year by the Posluns family of Toronto. From a fence on the manicured grounds, I looked toward Kiryat Shmona, last bombarded by Hezbollah in June.

On day 2, we were taken to Beit Hillel, a moshav in the panhandle of the Galilee. We had arrived for a rafting experience on the Hatzbani River, which rises in Lebanon. This being early July, the water was shallow and slow-moving. The guide and I shared a rubber craft, and for the next hour, we drifted lazily under an aromatic canopy of willow, eucalyptus and mulberry trees. Eventually, we passed a bend where the Hatzbani and Dan rivers converge. The passage over the only set of rapids, however, was anti-climactic. At Kibbutz Kfar Blum, we took a break until it was time to visit Dan, a kibbutz in the shadow of the Golan.

During the Six Day War, several Syrian tanks and some 300 commandos attacked Dan from an adjacent hill, but were repelled by the kibbutzniks. Beit Ussishkin, the kibbutz museum, is still pockmarked by bullets, an uneasy reminder of that brief, bloody battle.

Beit Ussishkin's exhibit of the rich flora and fauna of the area, including Mt. Hermon, is impressive. So are the relics from the ancient city of Dan, whose history can be traced back to the Early Bronze Age. Probably the single most important item on display is an Aramaic inscription on a stone tablet attesting to King David's life.

From Dan, indolent in the summer heat, we crossed the invisible border separating Israel from the Golan. I noticed a minefield, but it was fenced off. There was also a clear view of the drainage canals Syria built in the mid-1960s to divert water from the Jordan River. These canals sparked land and air battles with Israel

At Nahal Harmon Reserve, once a stronghold of the Syrian army, we poked about the ruins of a Greek temple. Then, negotiating a twisting path crowned by thick foliage and gnarled oak, plane and carob trees, we followed the course of the Banias River to the last remaining water-powered flour mill on the Golan and to what had been a Syrian officers' recreational pool. From there, it was a short amble to the park's chief attraction, the roaring water falls, whose fine spray I appreciated on this hot, dusty day.

There are four Druze villages on the Golan, and at one of them, Masada, 3,500 metres above sea level, there was a snack bar. Tacked to a wall were magazine photographs of Ehud Barak, Ezer Weizman, Yitzhak Rabin, Shaul Mofaz (Israel's chief of staff) and Princess Diana. What an incongruous ensemble! Having finished my falafel, I breathed in the pine-scented air, gazing down contentedly at Birket Ram, a round, lonely lake in the distance.

Three kilometres northeast of Banias, beyond a Druze fruit stand where I bought a bag of tasty, pale, red cherries, lay Nimrod Castle, a medieval Crusader or Arab fortress. Archeologists are not sure of its true origins. Perched high on a mountain, it offered magnificent views of Neve Ativ, the Golan's only ski resort, and of Israel itself.

Later, in the ragged town of Ein Qinya, we were treated to a fairly informative question-and-answer session on Druze history and culture presided over by a man in his 30s.

We spent our final day in the western Galilee, hiking in a lush and incredibly beautiful canyon, Nahal Kziv, which summoned up sweet memories of Vermont. The vegetation was regional – Kermes oaks, Assyrian maples, wild pistachios. Scrunched-up tissue paper and several condoms were scattered on the trail. Not a litter basket was in sight.

In a sylvan forest glade, after a bite of lunch, some of us enjoyed a bracing dip in a natural pool. The sun shimmered in the water; the minnows swam furiously.

Having rested, we continued tramping through woods, which had a storybook primeval quality. Then, after a stop at another cool pool, we began to ascend a steep ridge. Toward the summit, through the boughs of fragrant pines, I saw Montfort Castle, a Crusader redoubt which the Mamluks had destroyed.

As the tour ended, I cast one last wistful look at the mouldering castle. Though somewhat weary and sweaty from the day's activities, I felt exhilarated, glad that one more little bit of unspoiled, undeveloped rural Israel had been registered in my memory bank.

Jacob and Esau

By RABBI ROBERT RHODES

In this week's parshah, Jacob sent messengers ahead of him to Esau, his brother, and he charged them saying: "Thus shall you say to my lord Esau, so said your servant Jacob, I have sojourned with Laban, and I have lingered until now."

Jacob is about to meet his estranged brother after years of separation and fears for his life. Jacob had bought Esau's birthright and stolen his blessing at their father's deathbed. Jacob had had to run away from his brother's fury. The reunion was not expected to go well.

Jacob sends a humbly worded message that includes the following Hebrew phrase, im Lavan garti. I have lived as a transient with my uncle Laban. How could Jacob have said these words to Esau?

Rashi takes this to mean that Jacob sought to appease Esau.

Garti can be taken to mean that Jacob did not do well in the house of Laban. He remained an outsider, a temporary resident and so Esau should not be jealous of any wealth he might have thought Jacob had acquired.

Alternatively, Jacob could be saying that his spiritual values remained intact; he never settled into the ways of Laban.

Let's step back from the text and look at the context. Jacob's statement will become all the more dramatic.

Esau is strong and powerful. Laban is a materialist. They are blood relatives (uncle and nephew), and as we can see from the Torah readings of these past few weeks, both are men who value wealth and possessions. In addition, Esau is a powerful warrior.

Everything Jacob does up to this point seems designed to placate his brother. Why does he now throw into Esau's face a rejection of the material world? Why offend Esau?

Take a contemporary example. If you are interviewing at a top law firm for an entry-level position, would you mention your lack of interest in the law? Furthermore, if the interview is going well, would you toss in a remark about how you value anarchy as a solution to many of today's problems?

This is what I think Jacob did with Esau. He took every precaution against perceived physical danger. He addressed his fearsome brother with respect and deference. Then he said "My values are not like yours.

"I may have lived with our uncle Laban for years, but I have absorbed nothing of his priorities."

From the text of the Torah itself and the treatment of their characters in the midrashim, we know that Esau and Laban value the things of this world.

Jacob is the spiritual person. He is the ancestor of the Jewish people. He is the dreamer. He sees and talks to angels. He has respect for, and a healthy fear of the physically superior Esau.

He takes real precautions against a real threat. He knows that in this world the powerful expect and receive submissiveness. Yet he has to say what he really feels, im Lavan garti, with people like you and Laban, I am a stranger.

How many of us could look an Esau in the eye and say with respect, that we completely reject their basis of authority and power while acknowledging their supremacy as a fact?

The surrounding culture often seems to be overwhelming, especially at this time of year. Chanukah is so insignificant next to the winter holiday season that is now just beginning. Judaism is a minority way of life. How can we reject such a strong force? Jacob shows us exactly how to do it.

Rabbi Rhodes is the spiritual leader of Pride of Israel Congregation in Toronto.

Chanukah celebrations

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Chanukah approaches and once again we remember the age when Jews were steeped in the Hellenistic culture.

The holiday contains aspects of military victories against all odds, as well as aspects of religious autonomy, symbolized by lights that burned and burned.

Jewish law discusses the proper way of lighting our chanukiyahs. Should we start with one candle and add one every night (Hillel's opinion), or perhaps start with eight candles and subtract one each night (Shammai's opinion).

The Talmud stipulates that we begin with one candle and add one every night, in accordance with the opinion of Hillel. The reasoning behind this process is that we always increase and grow as we progress through life, our goal is never to decrease as we go.

By deciding the question of candlelighting in this way, the eight little candles that burn for so short a time in our homes become connected to a philosophical perspective on how a Jewish person should approach their life journey.

Jewish law also discusses where the chanukiyah should be placed once the candles are lit. One should try to place the candles outside the door, opposite the mezuzah, so as to encircle our doorways with commandments.

If putting it in our doorways is unrealistic, placing it in a window facing the street is suggested. One of the reasons given for this practice is to advertise the miracle of Chanukah.

In either case, emphasis is clearly placed on the public aspect of displaying the candles for all to see. The candles lit in the privacy of our homes are now being moved to the public domain.

Why must we try to do this with Chanukah candles and not with other festival objects? No one would consider storing their lulavs and etrogs in their windows when not in use, or keeping matzah displayed publicly during Pesach.

Yet it is very appropriate that we place our candles in the window. The miracle of Chanukah was itself twofold: both private and public.

When the Hasmoneans cleaned, purified and rededicated the Temple, this was a private miracle. When the Jewish people overcame all odds and won the military victory, this was a public miracle.

The miracles themselves echo the nature of the oppression we experienced at that time. The religious assault of the Greeks against the Jews was designed to separate the private and public aspects of the Jewish person.

One could be a Jew on the inside, but not show it in any way on the outside. Laws prohibiting study of Torah, observance of the Sabbath and the practice of circumcision were central to Greek oppression.

In fact, many Hellenistic Jews tried to "undo" their circumcisions, thus attempting to hide from the outside who they were on the inside.

The Hasmoneans and their followers fought against this duality of identity, insisting that the Jew must merge their private and public identities into one.

A midrash on Chanukah states that during the Greek oppression, Jews were told to engrave on the bolts of their doors "I have neither portion nor heritage in the God of Israel."

The Jews immediately removed the bolts from their doors, leaving themselves vulnerable but not complying with a public denial of who they truly are.

Those eight candles signify miracles, life journeys and our steadfast insistence on maintaining one balanced identity.

Perhaps these thoughts can flicker in our minds as we watch those little candles burn and burn.

Celebrating multiculturalism

A few weeks ago, the York Region District School Board became the first Ontario public school board to officially recognize Oct. 29 to Nov. 9 as Holocaust Education Week.

Guest Voices

In recognition of this, the school I teach at, Parkview Public School, had a week of lessons, storytelling and discussion, which culminated in an assembly where Susan Jackson of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and the students, were the presenters.

Upon entering the foyer of our school, you were faced with the realities of the Holocaust: family portraits of victims who died were surrounded by books that told the numerous accounts, and newspaper articles that shared the facts.

Encircling this display was a border of yellow stars created by the students. Each star had a word or two written by the students to describe their feelings about and reflections on the lessons they learned that week – words like: why?, six million, courage, strength and death.

I remember the first time I drove down Main Street, Unionville, for my interview. I thought I had suddenly been transported to a Hollywood movie set. It was so picturesque, so peaceful. I was taking a new turn in my teaching career, branching out of the day school system within which I had begun my career. I was anticipating the little things: Hallowe'en, Valentine's Day and even Christmas songs. What I discovered, however, was what I missed, and what I had to share.

What is it like to be a Jewish teacher in the public school system? For me, it started with a Christmas tree, a really beautiful Christmas tree that unfortunately made me feel left out.

It also started with an extremely supportive administration, an employer (the York Region District School Board) that not only encouraged multiculturalism but endorsed it through mandates. And it started with a little bit of my own chutzpah.

One day I bought an electric menorah, and with my principal's support, placed it on a table beside the Christmas tree. The thrill I got when I saw the handful of Jewish children at our school of 500 explain to their peers what the menorah was about is indescribable.

Everything I have done at my school to teach the students about my culture is a direct result of the multiculturalism endorsed by the board. We celebrate First Nations Week, Chinese New Year, Black History Month and Christmas, and now we commemorate one of the most tragic events in Jewish history.

When my students left the recent assembly, I hope they took with them an understanding that racism affects all of us and that we, as a multicultural community, all have a role to play to ensure something like the Holocaust never happens again.

Each child who volunteered to participate in the Holocaust assembly was from a different ethnic, cultural or religious group. That is what it means to be a Jewish teacher in a public school system.

More Talmud study sites

Today, I continue my look at the vast resources on the Internet for people who want to learn Daf Yomi, a double-page (daf) a day (yomi) of Talmud.

Orienting yourself in front of a page of Talmud can be quite daunting.To get a taste of the dynamics of a page, I highly recommend Eliezer Segal's beautifully constructed work [http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/TalmudPage.html]. Segal has reproduced a typical page of the Talmud, this one from the tractate of Megillah. When you click on the text, you can get an excellent insight into the structure of the page and the annotation that is indispensable to its understanding.

Part of the Talmud learning experience is grasping the large volume in your hands while learning along with your teacher. Although there is no online substitute, you can read the entire contents of the Babylonian [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/bavli/bavli.html] and JerusalemTalmuds [http:// www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/yer/yer.html] on your computer screen if you have Hebrew fonts installed. Please note that these pages are not set up in the standard format, nor do they include the classical commentators such as Rashi and Tosafot.

Most of the Daf Yomi commentary on the Internet is in English, but you can find some resources in Hebrew. The Dafyomi Advancement Forum has notes and commentaries from both the Yosef Da'as and the Galei Masechata [http://www.dafyomi.co.il/ivrit2.htm]. You do not need Hebrew fonts to view these pages, but should have the free Adobe Acrobat Reader installed on your computer [http://www.adobe.com/products/acrobat/readstep. html].

The Daf Yomi Sources Page has begun to scan Hebrew sources with hopes of compiling "a full functioning Virtual Library of Sifrei Kodesh (Sacred Texts) on the Internet." At the moment, they are working on Hebrew Daf Yomi resources for Tractate Shkalim [http://www.archival.org/heb/Shkal2.htm].

If you would like to listen and learn, there are some audio classes that can make Daf Yomi easier [http://www.613.org/daf.html]. There are links to hundreds of classes on audio, in addition to a basic lesson on the origins and evolution of the Talmud. Most of these are in English with some in Hebrew. If you prefer to learn in Yiddish, then listen to the late HaRav Avrohom Karp of the Lubavitcher shul in Montreal [http:// www.kol-avrohom.com/]. Rabbi Karp gave classes in Daf Yomi for close to 30 years and was recorded between 1969 and 1975. The library comprises well over 2,500 audio cassettes; however, only the current week's Daf Yomi classes can be found at the site.

There are still other hi-tech ways to study Daf Yomi. A couple of commercial CD-ROMs are available [http://www.613.org/dafcd.html]. And many cities offer daily telephone Dial-A-Daf services, although I could not find a comprehensive listing of them on the Internet. If you know of a listing, I will pass it along.

For more Daf Yomi sites, see Hareshima's Daf Yomi Resources [http://www.hareshima.com/study/DafYomi.asp], Eliot Shimoff's Talmud Page [http://www.research.umbc.edu/~shimoff/talmud. htm] and Jewish America's Daf Yomi [http://www.jewishamerica.com/dafyomi.htm].

I began this column by pointing out Eliezer Segal's excellent Page of Talmud site. Not surprisingly, Segal has completed studying all 2,711 double pages of the Talmud and has written a column about his undertaking [http:// www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/ Shokel/890419_Siyyum. html]. Since his studies took several years and followed him around the world, I was fascinated that Segal now associates particular sections of the Talmud with the milestones of his own life:

"One tractate conjures up associations with the Shi'ite village in Lebanon where I studied it during my Israeli army reserve duty; another page I plodded through while waiting in a queue at Disneyland; still another I read just before my first job interview at the University of Calgary. I imagine that these personal associations will be forever attached to their respective sugyas (topics)."

By the way, the next time you're standing in line at Disneyland and have forgotten what page to study for that day's Daf Yomi, no problem. Just take out your trendy Palm Pilot, run the Daf Yomi Calendar Program [http://st2.yahoo.com/pilotgearsw/dafyomiuacca.html] and you'll never go wrong.

Former New York mayor addresses UJA meet

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The former mayor of New York City, Ed Koch, a lawyer, newspaper columnist and author, was the keynote speaker at a recent dinner for UJA Federation Campaign 2000 major gift supporters, which drew close to 400 people.

Koch spoke with candor and humour on a range of issues which included New York municipal politics, the upcoming American presidential race, Hilary Rodham Clinton's prospective senatorial candidacy, and Middle East politics.

He was blunt in his assessment of his successors as mayor of New York City. Having served as mayor from 1978-89, Koch called his immediate successor, David Dinkins incompetent, and he described the current mayor, Rudolph Giuliani, as a mean and power-hungry person.

Describing himself as a moderate, Koch said that he supports another moderate, Bill Bradley, rather than Al Gore for the presidential nominee of the Democratic party, because he believes that Bradley is the winning ticket. "There's nothing wrong with Al Gore. But he can't win."

Calling himself one of Israel's biggest supporters, Koch told the audience that Israel can "secure peace without compromising security."

He also believes that Israel would be better off if it could secure a peace agreement while Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, – he's in frail health – is at the helm. "Israel should cut a deal with Arafat before he dies, before waiting to see who will succeed him."

While he is a proponent of peace, Koch acknowledged that 80 percent of the Arab population "would like to see Israel eradicated," and that the majority of people in Jordan and Egypt – countries that have peace treaties with Israel – are "opposed to peace with Israel. But their leaders want it."

Koch, when asked, gave his opinion on the Jonathan Pollard case: "It was dumb for the Israelis to use an American Jew [as a spy]." He told the audience that Pollard did not deserve any special consideration, and those presidents who have refused clemency have been very supportive of Israel.

UJA Federation volunteer Barry Sherman, spoke about fundraising, and the Jewish community's "obligation to the next generation."

He said that Jewish Toronto Tomorrow was a new campaign initiative which included an endowment and capital campaign for the future, when a greater percentage of the community will be seniors. He stressed that with the rapidly graying community "this new initiative is more important than ever."

Ed Koch

Sherman, chair of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, said this initiative has an endowment of $85 million, having just grown by $10 million in the last few months. He noted that a small number of families have made major contributions to this endowment fund.

Sherman announced other planning initiatives of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, among them, a $1.8 million donation from Miles Nadal of MDC Corporation for the renovation and redevelopment of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre; the construction of a new building to house the Jewish Campus Life Centre; the redevelopment of the Bathurst Jewish Centre; the recent $9 million renovation of CHAT; and planning for a new Jewish campus in York Region to meet the needs of the rapidly growing Jewish population there.

Mel Wolfond, the UJA Federation co-chair for Campaign 2000, said the goal was to raise $50 million, and to date close to $30 million has been raised, which is nearly $2 million ahead of last year's campaign at this time.

Other speakers that evening included Wolfond's campaign co-chair David Engel; Richard Cooper and Larry Wasser, the dinner co-chairs; and Alla Levy, director of Jewish Agency operations for the Russian region.

Spotting a cult said increasingly difficult

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Cults have become difficult to spot, says Rena Schochet, executive director of the Jewish Counseling and Resource Centre (JCRC).

"At one time, we could recognize a Hare Krishna walking down the street in his saffron robes," she said.

But lately, cults have "made themselves look far more legitimate than they ever did before. They make themselves look like they are part of a legitimate group," she said.

Schochet is an exit counsellor at the JCRC, a centre which uses mediation and communication to assist with family crises, including cult and abuse related problems.

At JCRC, Schochet works with family members to extricate relatives from cults, and then assists in building a healthy support system.

She spoke recently about "Cult-guarding the Jewish Family" as part of the Lunch and Learn program at Baycrest's Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre.

Schochet related stories of people who joined groups and later discovered they were cults.

She told one story about a friend who joined a parenting group in South Africa about 15 years ago and raved about it, until she began noticing strange elements within the group.

Its founder liked the power she gained when people came to her for help, and instead of just advising them on how to parent, she began telling members how to run their daily lives. They became very dependent, Schochet said.

"They wouldn't make a move without her," said Schochet. •

When Schochet's friend started to withdraw from the group, "they were very cold. They didn't keep contact with her and she felt a sense of relief," Schochet said.

This parenting group had evolved into a cult, Schochet said.

"When you have a person who tries to take over every facet of your life, you know you're in trouble," she said.

Cults can masquerade as psychological groups, self-help groups, support groups, or even religious groups, she said.

Beware of cults that present themselves as Jewish groups but actually teach falsehoods, she said.

Rena Schochet

"When you go in, you realize it's not [legitimate] and then they try to do a snowjob and say, oh, but you can really believe this way and that way and still be Jewish. Don't fall into that trap – it's not true."

To avoid falling into a cult, one must recognize its characteristics.

According to Schochet, the following are signs that a group may be a cult:

• Isolation – The group encourages isolation from family members and friends.

• Switching allegiance – The group wants the individual to transfer loyalty from the natural family to the cult family.

• Mind control – The group uses extreme and unethical techniques of manipulation to recruit and assimilate members.

Techniques may include: having members repeat phrases which members are told will help bring them closer to the group; trying to control members' thoughts, feelings and behaviour as a means of furthering the leader's and group's goals; pressuring or encouraging members to reveal dark secrets about themselves which will make them vulnerable to the group; love-bombing, which is when group members approach individuals extolling the virtues of the group, not allowing the person time or space to gather his or her thoughts.

• Deprivation – The group tries to make members weak and vulnerable by depriving them of sleep and food and thus the ability to make a free choice.

• Instilling fear – Members are afraid of leaving the group.

• Overly powerful group leader – One person is at the helm manipulating and controlling others. The leader keeps people in the group vulnerable so they depend on him or her.

• Donations – The group insists on large and continuous donations for the group.

Extricating a person from a cult can take anywhere between three months and two years, from "putting the first seeds of doubt in the person's mind to the point of exit," Schochet said.

To help extricate a friend or family member from a cult, Schochet recommends the following action:

• Consult an exit counsellor for assistance;

• Create a warm environment for the person in the cult;

• Create a supportive group of friends willing to embrace and befriend the former cult member;

• Request that a support group be established for friends and relatives who have been through the process;

• Have the former cultist join a support group of peers who have recently exited.

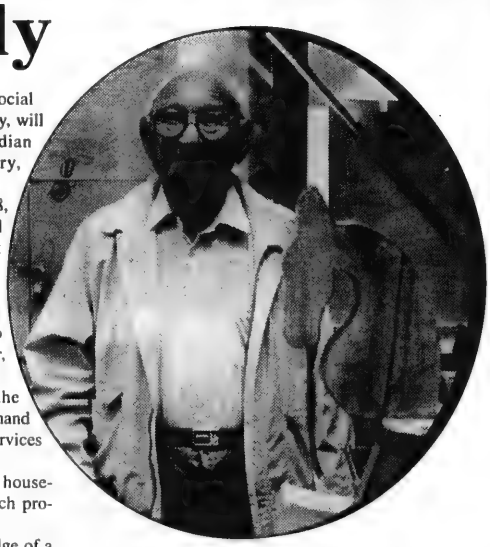
Plenary Panel Focuses On Elderly



Elder care, one of the most significant social issues facing Toronto's Jewish community, will be a key topic at the upcoming Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region Plenary, November 27-28.

A Plenary panel on Sunday, November 28, looking at "Emerging Issues in Elder Care," will include Ed Segalowitz, Vice-President Community Planning and Development, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Margaret MacAdam, Senior Vice-President at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Ontario Seniors' Secretariat Assistant Deputy Minister, Jeff Quirt.

"Jews have a specific obligation toward the elderly," says Segalowitz. "Jewish values command us to care for our elders and provide sensitive services as their needs change."

UJA Federation funds meals on wheels for housebound seniors and subsidizes a kosher hot lunch program at the Bernard Betel Centre.

"The Jewish community is on the leading edge of a demographic iceberg," observes Baycrest Foundation President, Dr. Elaine Todres, who is this year's Plenary Chair. However, she sees the disproportionate rate of aging in the Jewish community as an opportunity and not necessarily a burden.

"Collectively, we need to value the elderly, adopt a philosophy of aging in place (rather than in an institution) and ensure that government policies reflect that philosophy," she adds.

The Plenary's opening sold-out session, Saturday, November 27, features a panel of media personalities with, among others, CBC's Joe Schlesinger and Hana Gartner, a Czech Jew whose parents are Holocaust survivors. Entitled "From Tablet to Internet: Jews, Judaism and the Media," the forum will examine media coverage of Jewish issues. The evening will also feature a draw for two El Al tickets to Israel.

The Plenary's Sunday sessions are open to Canadian Jewish Congress council members. Admission is $36. For more information, please call Hindy Friedman at (416) 635-2883 ext. 175.

Reena Conference

Over 400 people recently participated in the first ever International Conference on Developmental Disabilities sponsored by Reena. The three-day event, chaired by Rabbi Joseph Kelman and funded in large part by UJA Federation, marked Reena's 25th anniversary. It included keynote addresses by Stephen Lewis, Deputy Executive Director of UNICEF and Mr. Justice Sam Filer, whose wife, Toni Silberman, also spoke about her husband's battle with Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis (ALS), otherwise known as Lou Gehrig's Disease. Reena client Rachel Samuels, shown below with Toni Silberman, shared her experience of twinning with community member Haley Banack earlier this year for a joint bat mitzvah celebration. Samuel's said "I felt proud and strong, and that made me very happy."

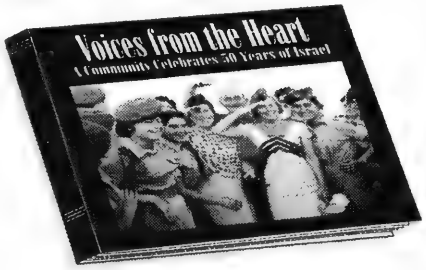
A Chanukah Gift From the Heart

UJA Federation is releasing new volumes of Voices from the Heart at a special Chanukah price.

Voices from the Heart, edited by Bonnie Goldstein and Jaclyn Shulman, is a one-of-a-kind collection of photographs and memories commemorating Jewish Toronto's love of Israel. Voices has received wide-spread acclaim for its nostalgic depiction of the close ties between Toronto's Jewish community and the State of Israel. The 400 page volume, now at a reduced cost of $36, is filled with emotion, based on personal stories and treasured photographs documenting Israel's triumphant history.



"So many of our community members have shared significant moments in their lives in such touching and revealing personal accounts," notes Shulman. "It's a wonderful Chanukah gift for the entire family and it is a perfect heirloom to pass on from one generation to another," adds Goldstein.

The book, which includes a forward by Israeli Minister of the Interior, Nathan Sharansky, and unique works from hundreds of other contributors, can be purchased by calling (416) 631-5685, or e-mailing to mspring@ujafed.org. Visa, Mastercard and American Express are accepted. Delivery is free with all orders.

David Horovitz Returns to T.O.

David Horovitz, Editor of the Jerusalem Report, brought the latest news from Israel while on his second visit to Toronto's Jewish community. The English-born Horovitz, who co-authored the Report's 1996 biography of Yitzhak Rabin, Shalom, Friend, which won a U.S. National Book Award for non-fiction, is about to release his second book about bringing up a family in Israel. While in Toronto, Horovitz spoke to UJA Federation supporters about the current political and social climate in Israel.

Dodging Danger To Rescue a Jewish Orphan

jewish toronto

To what lengths is the Jewish Agency prepared to travel for one Jewish orphan? Across several of the world's most dangerous borders to a primitive, snow-swept facility in the Republic of Inguishetia, west of Chechnya. That's where Alla Levy, who heads Jewish Agency operations in the Russian region, found Natasha.

After hearing reports of Jewish orphans, whose parents were killed in the ongoing Chechnyan war with Russia, Levy and her crew immediately took flight from Moscow to Pyatagorsk, the nearest landing point. "We had to cross four borders through one of the world's most dangerous areas, famous for kidnapping. Our local workers were terrified for us," she recently told a UJA Federation dinner audience of leading donors.

"We finally reached the orphanage in heavy snow to find a group of 75 orphans in the middle of nowhere. The orphanage was completely unequipped. They didn't have anything for the winter. The children were walking in the snow with Russian rubber sneakers. They lived in wooden huts, placed in beds so they could warm each other."

The orphanage director pointed to a Jewish girl named Natasha, who didn't know she was Jewish, because, according to Levy, she was registered as Russian "for her own good."

"She's 17," said Levy, "and her only dream is to go back to her studies, finish school and then become a doctor."

The Jewish Agency will be helping to make her dream come true, in addition to purchasing shoes and clothing for the other children – a charitable act, which, admitted Levy, "made me both sad and proud."

The Jewish Agency is funded by the world-wide UJA Federation network.

CCCJ Honours Brent Belzberg

UJA Federation's immediate past campaign chair is being honoured by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews (CCCJ).

On November 29, Brent Belzberg, President and C.E.O. of Harrowston Inc., will be presented with the CCCJ's Human Relations Award for his outstanding contribution in promoting cultural, racial and religious harmony, and combating racism within the community. Past award recipients have included Lincoln Alexander, John Diefenbaker, Stephen Lewis, Nathan Phillips, Jeanne Sauve, June Callwood and Bill Davis.

Since 1947, the CCCJ has been fighting to eliminate prejudice through a wide range of advocacy and educational activities.

Belzberg has a distinguished career in community service, which includes serving on the Board of Directors of the CCCJ, Mount Sinai Hospital and Beth Tzedec Congregation. He has also been active in raising funds for Israel Bonds, the University of Toronto, Holy Blossom's Out of the Cold Program and UJA Federation, where he chaired the Campaign for Fifty with Larry Tanenbaum.

"Brent's integrity and dedication have allowed all of us in the Jewish community to stand taller and be proud," says Tanenbaum. "He will no doubt continue to make strong contributions in fostering greater understanding and cooperation in our community."

"Brent's enthusiasm, commitment and humanitarian sensitivities make him a valuable advocate for our cause," adds CCCJ Executive Director Elyse Graff.

Richard Venn, who is also very active with UJA Federation will also be receiving an award.

Business Cabinet Thrives Under Naglie and Flatt

Harvey Naglie and Joel Flatt believe in getting down to business when it comes to making sure UJA Federation's annual campaign is a success.

As Chairs of UJA Federation's Business Cabinet, they oversee six separate campaign divisions comprised of 4000 contributors who raise approximately $5 million a year.

Joel Flatt

Flatt and Naglie, both of whom have been active with UJA Federation for five years, are particularly pleased gifts from Business Cabinet contributors have increased by over 10% this year.

Flatt, who co-chaired the Food Division last year, attributes a good part of the campaign's success so far to those who are pledging for three years. According to Flatt, it means that campaigners can concentrate on increased giving from other existing donors and bring new contributors into the UJA Federation fold.

"It helps us develop closer ties with our supporters as well as cultivate new relationships," says Flatt.

Naglie, who headed UJA Federation's Investment Division for two years, also feels it's important to keep in touch with donors. That's why he likes to meet face to face with contributors when it comes time to ask for their support. "When we sit across from each other they get a real sense of my strong commitment to UJA Federation," explains Naglie, who still comes out to pitch in at telethons. "I try to do whatever it takes to get the job done."

But it's not all work for Naglie and Flatt, who feel like they're getting back more than they give. "By being a part of the leadership you learn so much about how UJA Federation benefits the entire community," says Flatt. "It's a real privilege to be involved in such a fulfilling way."

"I get tremendous satisfaction from working with so many great volunteers who share my deep commitment to the cause," adds Naglie. "It makes me feel like I'm really living and doing something good."

New Israeli party launched

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Israeli parliamentarian has formed what he hopes will be a major new political force in Israel's large and increasingly influential Russian Jewish community.

Roman Bronfman, who broke away from Natan Sharansky's Israel B'Aliya party last summer but is still sitting in the Knesset, has established a secular, liberal party called The Democratic Choice.

Bronfman, a 45-year-old Ukrainian Jew who made aliyah in 1980 and won election to the Knesset in 1996 and again this year, believes that The Democratic Choice can win four to five seats in the next general election and thus promote the Arab-Israeli peace process and the concept of religious pluralism.

"I sit on the biggest reservoir of Russian voters, who are moderate ideologically," said Bronfman, who was here to introduce his party to Canadian Jews. Following his visit to Toronto, he flew to Washington to brief U.S. State Department officials on his views.

In the wake of Israel's last general election in May, he and Alex Tsinker, a fellow Russian immigrant, quit Israel B'Aliya, leaving it with four Knesset seats. Sharansky called the defections "a hurtful and treacherous betrayal."

In an interview, Bronfman said that he broke ranks with Israel B'Aliya over policy and philosophical differences.

Hurling Sharansky's accusation back at him, Bronfman explained that he timed his departure for after the election so as not to jeopardize Israel B'Aliya's chances at the polls. "If I had left before the election, it would have been disastrous for the party."

Roman Bronfman

Bronfman disclosed that his ideological – as well as personal – disagreements with Sharansky came to a head toward the close of the 1999 election campaign.

In his judgment, Sharansky – the minister of interior in Prime Minister Ehud Barak's current government and, previously, the minister of industry and trade in Benjamin Netanyahu's cabinet – has lost his credibility among many Russian Jews and does not represent them anymore.

Bronfman, who is no longer on speaking terms with him, said that in last summer's coalition talks Sharansky made demands "which do not reflect the true interests or positions of our constituents, both on domestic issues and on foreign policy."

Arguing that the vast majority of Russian Jews are secular, he said that Sharansky and his chief lieutenant, Yuli Edelstein, the former minister of immigrant absorption, are Orthodox or lean toward Orthodoxy.

Sharansky, he charged, betrayed his constituents by signing a coalition agreement with Barak that forbids him to raise issues pertaining to religion and state. These issues, he said, are of prime concern to Russian immigrants.

Bronfman, however, gave Sharansky credit for building the Russians into a formidable political constituency and ensuring that immigrant absorption is a national priority.

"The significance of the Russian community as a swing vote cannot be overemphasized," he said, pointing out that Russian immigrants were responsible for the outcome of the past three elections.

The Russians, he observed, are coalescing into two distinct camps. One camp, epitomized by Avigdor Lieberman's Yisrael Beiteinu party, which won four Knesset seats in 1999, tends to be right-wing and hawkish. The other camp, his own, is pluralistic in matters of religion and state and more moderate vis-a-vis war and peace.

Outlining his views, Bronfman said he is working for an open society based on democratic principles and the separation of religion and state. Politics and religion do not mix, he said, noting that religion should be the private domain of individuals.

Asked whether he thought that Israel should be "a state of its citizens," as Israeli Arab parliamentarian Azmi Bishara contends, Bronfman replied, "Israel must give all its citizens human and civic rights. But Israel's Jewish character should remain intact."

He added that he was neither anti-clerical nor anti-religious.

Describing himself as a centrist with respect to the Mideast peace process, Bronfman claimed that he had been a moderating influence during the Netanyahu era, while Sharansky has turned hawkish.

Sharansky, he said, has soured on the Oslo process, opposes a withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for peace with Syria, and wants Israel to keep all the settlements in the territories.

By contrast, Bronfman is fully behind Oslo, accepts the necessity of giving up the Golan up to the international rather than the June 4, 1967 line, and thinks that some settlements are expendable.

Although Bronfman is resigned to the emergence of a fullblown Palestinian state, he said that Israel should retain about one-third of the West Bank, including the Jordan Valley, after a final accord with the Palestinians. He expressed optimism that the Palestinian leadership would ultimately accept such a division.

Bronfman, a resident of Haifa and former editor-in-chief of the Russian newspaper Vremya, suggested that Russian immigrants have integrated themselves into Israeli society reasonably well. Sixty percent, though, are not working in their professional fields.

About 10 percent of the olim have returned to the former Soviet Union, having been unable to adapt to Israel.

He expects 85,000 Russians to arrive in Israel by the end of 1999, and close to 200,000 in 2000.

Israeli yeshiva director hopes to launch exchange program

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Avraham HaCohen, director of Mekor Haim Educational Institutions in Israel, would like to infuse Toronto Hebrew schools with the joy of learning.

He was in Toronto recently to discuss with educators the possibility of setting up an exchange program between Toronto Hebrew schools and his yeshiva.

HaCohen has been with the yeshiva – located in Kibbutz Kfar Etzion, just south of Jerusalem – for three years. The driving force behind the school, he says, is to be inclusive.

"When Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz founded the school 14 years ago, it was with the desire to reach out and make our heritage available to all Jews. [His wish] is to educate a generation who will have the drive to reach out to others who are different."

In Israel, said HaCohen, this is one of the single most important issues. "One of the country's greatest threats is the fracturing of society, whether it is because of religious, ethnic or political differences.

Avraham HaCohen

"Young people should not live in a bubble; they should create bonds with other Jews. That is what we consider essential for their formative years in high school."

The program he has in mind, says HaCohen, would involve student exchange and faculty interaction. "We believe that our approach to education is unique, and we would like others to be exposed to it."

The school has been chosen by the Ministry of Education as one of a select number of experimental schools to serve as a model for other institutions in Israel, he says.

The classic model of education, HaCohen says, is "top down. That model does not build men. It tests the ability of students to absorb information, to the degree that someone who absorbs more, gets better grades."

At Mekor Haim, a dormitory-based high school for about 230 boys, students learn with partners and in groups, "and they understand that learning takes place in many ways, not just in the classroom. Students are empowered to be full partners in the education process.

"If we acknowledge that each person has something to offer, then, when we meet someone who is different than us, we will understand that we can learn from those differences."

Students at Mekor Haim come from all over Israel and their "family backgrounds are diverse. Artificial distinctions such as the style of one's head covering or apparel are irrelevant to relationships, they just enhance the beauty of the tapestry of our community," says school literature.

The teachers at his school act as facilitators and role models, HaCohen says. "We do not succeed in education by imprinting. Students here, choose to follow the models of people they find worthy of emulating, not because there have been demands made on them."

Constant interaction

There is constant interaction at all grade levels; students are usually grouped by what they know, and not by their grade level, says HaCohen."Our message is that we are all constantly learning from one another. Students teach students, and sometimes students teach faculty. I hope that we can share some of these elements with other schools."

HaCohen, who was founding executive director of Avi Chai Philanthropic Foundation in New York, says he came to Mekor Haim after sending his four sons to school there.

"I became very enthusiastic about the education they received there, and it has been an education for me. I went to school in Texas and Connecticut, and I had a top down education."

Applicants to the school must take a test, and the school is only able to accept one out of every seven applicants.

HaCohen invites people to visit the school campus "to see what we're doing. We would like people to meet the students. We also want to be an influence on the way others think of the education of young people."

Our camp's reputation is growing!

But space is shrinking – so enroll your child now!

There's already a waiting list for some age groups!

Word's getting around about this world class lakefront camp with programs to build young Jewish values. And next summer will be even better, with more cabins, more activities, more Judaic crafts. But you should call now! Some age groups in some sessions are already sold out!

Golden to be honoured at JNF Negev Dinner

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For the first time in the 51 years of Negev Dinners, a daughter of a former honouree will receive one of the highest honours given by the Jewish community here.

On Dec. 5, the Jewish National Fund 1999 Negev Dinner will pay tribute to Anne Golden.

Golden's father, Theodore (Teddy) Richmond, an industrialist and community leader, was honoured in 1981.

Golden said that her father, a strong Zionist, quoted Hillel, and taught her about responsibility to community.

And from her mother, Florence, who was raised in Detroit, she learned about racism and to be aware of the problems of social injustice.

For more than 18 years, Anne Golden has been with the United Way of Greater Toronto, serving as president for the past 12 years.

In an interview in her office at the United Way, Golden told The CJN that throughout her life, she has searched for activities that will "avoid boredom and present a challenge."

She was one of the first to have a bat mitzvah at the Goel Tzedec Synagogue, later the Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Golden graduated from the University of Toronto with a specialization in history and political science. She later received a master's degree in American History at Columbia University, and then a doctorate from U of T in 1970.

Anne Golden

She taught history at Newark College of Engineering, the University of Toronto, and York University.

Golden began her professional career as the co-ordinator for David Crombie's mayoralty campaign in 1972.

She became a special advisor to the leader of the Ontario Liberal party and was promoted to director of research.

Joining the United Way in 1982, she headed up allocations and later became campaign director. She was appointed president of the United Way in 1987.

As president of the United Way, she is responsible for the country's largest annual fund-raising campaign. This year it seeks to raise close to $65 million.

In 1995, Golden was appointed by former premier Bob Rae to chair the Greater Toronto Area Task Force, which was to report in 18 months.

After the election of Premier Mike Harris, the task force's time was cut in half.

Realizing that the committee had already invested valuable tax dollars in the project, she said that she felt she did not want to give up the commitment the task force had made.

The Golden Report was completed and published in January 1996. It addresses the problems facing Greater Toronto, and proposes recommendations for property tax and assessment reform, regional planning and governance.

She accepted another challenge in 1998, to act as chair of the Homeless Action Task Force, reporting to Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman.

The final report, Taking Responsibility for Homelessness: An Action Plan for Toronto, was released in January 1999. It outlines 105 recommendations for all three levels of government and sets forth an action plan to solve homelessness.

In 1994, she was named one of the 50 Most Influential Women in Canada, by Chatelaine Magazine. In 1998, Global Television and the Toronto Sun selected her as Newsmaker of the Year. Earlier that year, Variety awarded her a Diamond Award for her contributions to the community.

Golden told The CJN she learned early that if you have a worthwhile purpose, you can get people to work with you.

"At the United Way, I work with outstanding, creative and talented people," she says.

The Goldens have visited Israel many times. Recently, she presented a paper at the Ralph Halbert School of Canadian Studies at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

She is currently involved in an international project on cities.

Golden says that as her Negev Dinner project she chose Moshav Dishon, a farming village in northern Galilee, adjacent to the Lebanese border.

"I chose it because community has been the theme of my life."

The funds collected for the Negev Dinner will assist the small agricultural community to develop its production and infrastructure and thereby enable it to double its population to 200 families.

She notes that it is most fitting that her father's Negev Dinner project was also an agricultural development located in the Galilee.

"My secret for success is to marry someone who is emotionally secure, kind and has integrity." She pauses and with a mischievous twinkle in her eyes she adds, "and he should be cute."

More seriously she adds, "I've been able to embrace challenges because I've always had the loving support of my husband [Dr. Ron Golden], my two daughters, Beth and Karen, and a supportive network of friends." The Goldens are the grandparents of Teddy and Sophie.

Rushing out of her office to present a speech, she apologizes for cutting the interview short. As we walk to the elevator, she says, "To be successful, you must be lucky, be involved, care for others, and take advantage of opportunities."

The Negev Dinner Campaign and Dinner co-chairs are Gerald Schwartz, Lawrence Tanenbaum and John Turner.

Reservations for the Anne Golden Negev Dinner can be made by calling 416-638-7200 or fax 416-638-7345.

Schneid art collection donated to the U of T

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A vivid collection of autobiographical material – photographs, letters and catalogues – chronicling the lives and careers of European Jewish artists, many of them murdered during the Holocaust – has been donated to the University of Toronto.

The treasure trove, amassed by Otto Schneid, a Jewish painter, sculptor and art historian who died in Toronto in 1974, was given to the university by his widow, Miriam Schneid-Ofseyer.

"She wanted the material to be available to scholars," explained Barry Walfish, the Judaica specialist at the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library, where the collection is housed. "It wouldn't be any good in an attic."

"People will learn about artists they know and some they have never heard of," said Mrs. Schneid-Ofseyer.

"This is an invaluable addition to our extensive holdings of Judaica," said Walfish. "It will be a great resource for scholars of Jewish art and culture. It is an important archive of Jewish art of the first half of the 20th century."

Born in Jablunkova, Czechoslovakia in 1900, Schneid studied art history, philosophy and esthetics in Vienna and Paris.

In 1930, three years before Adolf Hitler's accession to power in Germany, Schneid began researching a book to disprove the Nazi theory that Jewish art was decadent.

"He decided to travel around Europe and visit the best Jewish artists and then write a book about them, so that Hitler would really know what Jewish art was," recalled his widow.

Schneid also corresponded with a number of these artists, including Marc Chagall and Amadeo Modigliani. All told, he contacted about 120 artists, from Maurycy Applebaum and Nathan Altman to Feliks Frydman and Isaac Lichtenstein.

In the course of his research, he collected their exhibition catalogues, photographs of their canvases and their autobiographies. And he scrupulously kept their letters.

Schneid, an Austrian citizen, finished the manuscript for his long-awaited book in 1938, a seminal year during which Germany annexed Austria and Kristallnacht broke out.

The Nazis confiscated the manuscript and blacklisted Schneid, prompting him to flee to Poland.

In 1939, he made his way to Palestine, carrying a valise packed with his research materials and a copy of the banned manuscript.

He did not know a soul when he reached Palestine, and life was hard. Occasionally unemployed, even hungry, Schneid eked out a living as a lecturer on kibbutzim. In 1948, the Technion hired him to lecture on art history.

Schneid met his wife – a budding teacher and poet who eventually taught at the Associated Hebrew School in Toronto – in a cafe in Jerusalem in 1945. She was 21 and he was 45. They were married a few months later. They had two sons, both of whom are psychologists.

In 1960, Schneid left the Technion to devote himself to painting and sculpture. Today, his paintings and sculptures are found in galleries in Italy, England, Austria and the United States.

An Israeli publishing house bought Schneid's manuscript in the mid-1950s, but cancelled publication when Cecil Roth's history of Jewish art appeared. The publisher surmised that the market was saturated.

So, for the second time in two decades, Schneid's hopes of publishing his book were dashed by events beyond his control.

Hoping to find a market for his book, Schneid took his family to the United States in 1960. They settled in Toronto in 1963.

Although Schneid wrote several art books during his career, the manuscript that had sustained him since the 1930s has yet to be published, and is now an integral part of the University of Toronto's collection.

Walfish said that Schneid's papers and photographs are important because they preserve a body of work that might otherwise have been obliterated during the Holocaust.

"Many of the artists were killed during World War II, and for some, Schneid's collection is the only record of their existence," said Walfish.

The collection will be open to the public early next year.

Hebrew books donated to university

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the second time in three years, a Toronto businessman has donated Hebrew books and manuscripts to the University of Toronto's Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library.

Albert Friedberg, an investment dealer, recently gave the U of T some 160 books and five manuscripts, said Barry Walfish, a Judaica specialist in the library.

"It's a very valuable collection," he noted, declining to reveal its dollar value. "We're sworn to confidentiality."

In 1996, Friedberg, founder of the Friedberg Mercantile Group, provided the library with its first gift of more than 100 Hebrew manuscripts, books and genizah fragments.

Walfish explained that Friedberg decided to donate part of his holdings to the university because he had been deluged with requests from scholars who sought access to the books and manuscripts in his private collection.

Among the items in the U of T's collection is a hand-written copy of a Pentateuch, a biblical manuscript of the first five books of the Hebrew Bible, and six early printed editions of the Mishneh Torah of Maimonides.

The Friedberg collection is available for consultation from Monday to Friday from 9 a.m. to 4:45 p.m.

The Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library, at 130 St. George St., is a bibliophile's dream. Its massive collection of some 700,000 volumes ranges from a book printed in Augsburg, Germany, in 1483 to the literary papers of Margaret Atwood and Mavis Gallant.

Rabbi describes his journey from church to Judaism

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "We were looking for the will of God. We found it."

With this simple statement, Rabbi Asher Wade described the journey he and his wife took from active membership in the Christian church to an Orthodox lifestyle.

Rabbi Wade was speaking to a standing room only crowd at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill. The event was sponsored by Or Somayach.

Rabbi Wade grew up in a pious Christian household. He was an ordained pastor in the Methodist church in Hamburg, Germany. As well, he was moving up the academic ladder.

"I had it made in the academic world and in the church," he said.

He knows the exact date his life began to change – Nov. 5, 1978. It was a Sunday morning, 2½ months after his marriage. The Wades were eating breakfast and reading the paper before going to church.

"There were pictures of synagogues engulfed in flames, books on fire, shattered storefronts, lines of men in yarmulkes being marched down the street. It was the 40th anniversary of Kristallnacht, and the newspaper editor had prepared a special supplement."

One picture of a large synagogue was strangely haunting and familiar, the rabbi said. It turned out that it was the central synagogue of Hamburg.

"I recognized it by the buildings around it. The synagogue was gone, but I knew the area. It was the parking lot that I crossed every day on my way to the university.

"I never let my feet touch that holy ground again," he added.

There were no signs or monuments or markers, he said. "It was as if the Jews never lived there, never contributed to the life of Germany. It was like a figment of imagination."

The rabbi and his wife decided to find out what happened in the 10 months between Kristallnacht and the outbreak of World War II.

"On Nov. 11, did people just get up and go to work?"

As a representative of a Christian church, he asked himself, "Where were the Protestant ministers and Catholic priests – those I patterned my life after?"

He asked members of his congregation what it was like to be Christian the Sunday after Kristallnacht. They told him he had no respect for his elders to ask a question like that. They said he didn't understand.

He discovered that after Hitler came to power, legally, in 1933, "the first to join the Nazi party were the university faculties."

Students also joined, and later drove around to various libraries, pulling Jewish books off the shelf and burning them.

Rabbi Wade said it just didn't make sense that such a thing could happen in the country "that produced Goethe and Schiller."

While it appeared to him that people could more readily accept that such terrible things could happen someplace like Outer Mongolia ("Who knew where it was? Who knew what it was?") he noted that even today, people don't realize, or don't want to realize, that the same thing happened in Rwanda.

The Wades began to wonder: "Who is this strange tribe [the Jews] we see all over the world who kept together even without a country, who joked about their experiences?"

Every Sunday, he said, pastors would tell their congregants to be more Christ-like, but people didn't really know what Christ was like.

They wanted to know, he said, what the will of God was for Christians. When they looked at the Bible, "it told exactly what the will of God is – what we should do, and what we shouldn't do."

When they turned to the Christian Bible, not only were there no instructions about the will of God, but it said that Jesus told people they didn't have to follow the laws God had given in the Old Testament.

"How could we accept a Son of God who didn't even keep the fifth of the Ten Commandments, to honour your father?"

While Rabbi Wade didn't discuss the actual conversion, he said that at that point, he and his wife began to attend synagogue. They were converted by the beit din of Frankfurt.

The Wades now live in Jerusalem, where Rabbi Wade is a senior lecturer at Ohr Somayach.

He said that when he was first asked to lecture about his move from Christianity to Judaism, "it was a puzzle why a Jewish audience would be interested it."

To him, the whole thing seemed very logical. "We found the truth, verified it, and patterned our lives on it."

Matt Cohen wins Governor-General's award for novel

Asked whether Elizabeth and After represented any kind of literary departure for him, Cohen, who is 57 and battling lung cancer, said that on the the contrary, for him the book represented a sort of return.

"I think it's a return to the rural landscapes that I wrote about in the 1970s," he said. "On the other hand, I think it's a book devoted so entirely to character, so entirely to Elizabeth and Carl McKelvey, that it's both a continuation of what I've been doing and something new."

Cohen was born in Kingston, Ont., grew up there, and returned to a farm north of the eastern Ontario city in the 1970s.

"When I think of home, that's what I think of," he said. "Everyone makes their home somewhere, that's part of the mythology that they make up for themselves. For instance, Carl's home is West Gull: he can't go anywhere else. But a lot of other people have to leave West Gull to find themselves."

As in a handful of Cohen's previous works, including The Spanish Doctor, Nadine and Emotional Arithmetic, the protagonist of Elizabeth and After — the charming Elizabeth McKelvey — is Jewish. Her parents are from Galicia. But for Cohen, being Jewish is not an essential characteristic; rather, it's just one of many traits that define some of the characters who populate his books.

"Being myself a Jew from Kingston, it's part of my life and part of my interest," he said. "But Jews are not unique in being in many ways on the margin of Western society, and being faced with the problem of whether to assimilate or try to retain their identity. I think they have that in common with dozens of millions of other people who are immigrants."

Cohen, who lives in the Annex neighbourhood of Toronto, is currently finishing a collection of stories, Getting Lucky, to be published by Knopf Canada in the spring. He's also working on a novel about the Jewish-Austrian novelist, Joseph Roth.

You can catch Cohen read Dec. 12, 11a.m. at the Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. in Toronto, part of the Books & Bagels program.

Shmuel Carmeli: Making the Grade

At age 19, a commander in the tank corps during the Yom Kippur war, Shmuel Carmeli's life took a tragic turn.

As he was moving towards the Suez, unfazed by an earlier attack on his tank, an anti-tank missile found its mark. It left Shmuel unconscious and paralyzed.

Encouraged by two successful surgeries to remove shrapnel from his spine, Shmuel was told that he would again have use of his legs. Hope however faded as days in a wheelchair turned into months. Determined, with the aid of braces and Beit Halochem, it took three long and painful years for Shmuel to walk again.

Plenty of available time and limited career choices enabled Shmuel to earn his Ph.D. in chemistry and he is now a senior lecturer at Tel Aviv University. Shmuel, a married father of three, is a fine example of Beit Halochem's success.

HEBREW UNIVERSITY OF JERUSALEM

Youth participation in Holocaust week said to be disappointing

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lori Sabo was upset when she discovered that learning about the Holocaust is not a priority for many university and college students.

The York University student realized this last month while discussing the Holocaust with a friend who said: "It's a very disturbing topic – why don't we just forget about it?"

Sabo was surprised at his response and when she later attended Holocaust Education Week events, she was disappointed with the low student turnout.

Some organizers were also disappointed.

"I think it's your duty as a human being to look back into history – especially if it's your own," Sabo said in a phone interview.

When Sabo suggested that she and her friend attend the events, he wasn't keen. So she attended the first program without him.

At this event, a woman who was aboard the St. Louis – the luxury liner denied entry into Canada on the eve of World War II – was asked what advice she had for young people.

Learn from your past, she said, because it seems we have learned nothing from the Holocaust. There are still atrocities happening around the world, in Kosovo and East Timor, for example. People outside these events are going on with their lives, just as they did during the Holocaust.

"Looking around, [I realized] there weren't any young people to hear that," Sabo said.

"I'd say maybe six people were under the age of 25 or 30. The majority of people there were my grandparents' age," she said.

Perhaps students are repelled from attending events because of the way the Holocaust has been taught, suggested Michelle Lackie, director of the Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto.

Often the approach is "your typical shock value program, like pictures of skeletons and pictures of starved people, and there's only so much of that people can take," she said.

Holocaust awareness programming should relate to what is happening today, such as the atrocities in Rwanda, she said.

Howard Driman, who was the co-chair of the recent Holocaust Education Week, says that while more young people attended this year's events than in previous years, he would still like to have seen more youth.

He was particularly disappointed by the small number of students who attended A Page from the Holocaust, a dramatization presented on the York and U of T campuses.

According to Driman, only about seven people, including one student, attended the play at York; at U of T, about 25 people attended, he said.

"You'd think if they were interested, they could find 40 minutes to go to a program," he said, referring to poor student attendance in general.

Jeremy Zacks, president of the Jewish Student Federation (JSF) agreed that this program, held at the beginning of York's Holocaust Awareness Week, did not have the best turnout, but said more than seven people and more than one student attended.

After the event, the week's organizers increased publicity, and as a result, about 20 students attended each remaining event, he said.

Arye Berk, the director of the University of Western Ontario's Jewish Students' Union (JSU), said there is strong student interest in the Holocaust on Western's campus.

At the beginning of each year, students sign membership forms indicating which areas of the JSU they are interested in, and Holocaust awareness is one area the majority tick off, he said.

"Even students who can't read Hebrew, haven't been to a synagogue – my experience has shown Holocaust is the one thing they still feel connected to," he said.

Dr. Skorecki's team of 20 researchers are using leading edge technology to identify the genes that cause disease. They're also working to develop new mechanisms that can control cell growth leading to new treatments.

It's a work in progress, and one that is making significant advances in the biotechnological field. It is our hope that with the continued efforts of Dr. Skorecki's team and your ongoing support, Technion can extend its reach to build a healthier world for us all.

FOOD

The art of latke preparation

By LINDA MOREL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

People who love latkes consider their preparation an art. For Jews of eastern European descent, latkes call for potatoes the way blintzes cry for cheese. But recently, creative cooks have been welcoming new ingredients, changing the taste of tradition.

A couple of years ago, Martha Stewart Living magazine featured mushroom latkes as a side dish. Along with the recipe came a glossy photo of sauteed mushrooms resting between layers of fried matzah. Fired up by the concept, I began searching for latke recipes calling for anything but potatoes.

I tried corn pancakes prepared with chili, cumin and cilantro. Inspired by Asian cuisine, I developed carrot noodle latkes. Frying noodles to a birds' nest crunch, I infused them with ginger and scallions, flavours from the Far East. But is it right to take latkes so far from their roots?

Actually, the word latke is Yiddish for pancake. By definition, there is no link to potatoes. Even though Ashkenazi Jews claim potato latkes as Chanukah's signature dish, these crisp pancakes are a relatively recent addition to our cuisine.

Originating in South America, potatoes were unknown in Europe until the 16th century, when explorers brought back tuber shoots. Because this crop flourished in eastern Europe, potatoes became a staple of the diet. It didn't take long for Jews to prepare pancakes from this inexpensive ingredient, which they often browned in chicken schmaltz – except at Chanukah, when goose fat prevailed.

Yet centuries before the potato's debut in Europe, it is likely that Chanukah pancakes were made from cheese in honour of the beautiful widow Judith. An unsung heroine, Judith was a contemporary of the Maccabees.

According to legend, she invited an enemy general to dinner, knowing he intended to destroy her town. During the meal, she served great quantities of cheese so that he would become thirsty and she could ply him with wine. When the general fell into a drunken sleep, she beheaded him, averting disaster for her town.

Better known is the story of how Judah the Maccabee and his followers launched a revolt against Emperor Antiochus IV and his Syrian-Greek troops, refusing to let foreigners forcibly hellenize Judea by outlawing Jewish practices.

Three years later, when they chased the oppressors from Jerusalem, the Temple lay in ruins. Although priests found only one vial of untainted oil, enough to burn for 24 hours, miraculously the flame lasted eight days.

Drawing from the two stories, both dairy products and oil have influenced Chanukah cuisine. Think of potato latkes served with sour cream. Less renowned are ricotta pancakes, a delicately sweetened crepe. Tasting like little cheesecakes, they are a surprising addition to brunch.

For at least a century, competing ingredients have been encroaching on potato territory. In Jewish cookbooks, numerous examples of potato latke recipes have also called for shredded parsnips, beets or carrots. For incremental, but richly rewarding flavour, add one of these vegetables to the batter of your favourite potato latke recipe.

In her International Jewish Cookbook, Faye Levy touts the versatility of latkes.

"A selection of several types of pancakes of different colours makes great Chanukah party fare," she wrote, offering several recipes. Her vegetable pancakes call for mushrooms, celery, carrots – and peas!

Aware that any produce can be mixed with eggs and flour and fried to a crackling crunch, a creative friend concocted her own vegetable latkes from leftovers. With golden shortening sizzling around her current batch of vegetable batter, she has one piece of advice: "Hold the potatoes. Oil is the heart of Chanukah latkes."

VEGETABLE LATKES

1 small onion, peeled and diced fine
12 small mushrooms, sliced thin vegetable oil for frying salt & pepper to taste
2 medium carrots
1 small parsnip
1 cup frozen peas, at room temperature
2 eggs, slightly beaten
4 tbsp. flour

On a medium flame, saute onion and mushrooms in oil in a large, non-stick skillet, until wilted. Sprinkle with salt and pepper and stir.

Peel and grate carrots and parsnips, adding them to the skillet with peas. Stir one minute. Let cool.

Move vegetables to a large bowl. Add eggs and flour, mixing well with a spoon. If batter is loose, gradually add flour until a moist batter forms.

Place ¼-inch of oil in skillet, heating on medium flame. Drop heaping tablespoons of batter into skillet, flattening with back of a spoon. Add more oil as needed.

Don't turn until bottom side browns. Keep turning until both sides are crisp, and centres are done. Be careful that they don't burn.

Drain on two layers of paper towels. Serve with sour cream. Yield: 8-10 latkes

CARROT-NOODLE LATKES

8 oz. fine noodles
5 carrots, peeled and grated
1 bunch scallions, sliced thin
2 eggs, beaten
½ tsp. ground ginger
salt & white pepper to taste
4 tbsp. flour
sesame oil for frying

Prepare noodles according to package instructions. Drain and place in a large bowl.

Add remaining ingredients, mixing well with a spoon. If batter is loose, gradually add more flour until a moist batter forms.

Pour ¼-in. of oil into a large, non-stick skillet, heating on medium flame.

Drop heaping tablespoons of batter into skillet, flattening with back of a spoon. Add more oil as needed.

Don't turn pancakes until bottom browns. (A few noodles may break off when turning the first time.) Turn until both sides are crisp, not burned.

Drain on two layers of paper towels. Serve with soy sauce. Yield: 12-14 pancakes.

RICOTTA PANCAKES

1 cup part-skim ricotta cheese
2 eggs
3 tbsp. flour
1 tbsp. vegetable oil, plus oil for frying
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
¼-cup pignoli nuts (or blanched slivered almonds)

Place all ingredients, except nuts, in a food processor using a steel blade. Process until lumps disappear and mixture swells to a creamy batter.

Scrape sides of bowl with a spatula. Add nuts and process briefly until well blended.

Pour ¼-inch of oil into a large, non-stick skillet over a medium flame. Drop heaping tablespoons of batter into skillet. Add oil as needed. When pancakes bubble and bottom sides brown, gently turn and brown the other side.

Sprinkle confectioners' sugar on top. Serve with sour cream. Yield: 16-18 pancakes.

Chanukah Delights

Enjoy healthy creations for Chanukah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Most of us have accepted that the mitzvah of keeping kosher does not automatically make us healthy. French fries and breaded chicken deep fried in kosher oil can still clog the arteries.

Most of us also reason that we can eat whatever is offered on festivals, because, after all, how many festivals are there?

Just ask Gail Ashkanazi-Hankin, author of an excellent new cookbook Festivals of Lite Kosher Cookbook (Pelican, 1999).

She points out in her introduction that "yes, Passover is only once a year, but so are Rosh Hashanah, Sukkot and Chanukah (two more week-long holidays), Purim, and Shavuot – all featuring foods traditionally laden with calories – not to mention Shabbat, which comes every week."

Festivals of Lite offers many traditional recipes adapted to today's lower calorie, lower fat, lower sugar tastes. French toast is made without eggs but with maple syrup, cholent gets its taste from sun-dried tomatoes or spices, rather than from fat, and strudel is rich with fruits, rather than sugar.

Ashkenazi-Hankin also provides vegetarian dishes, as well as recipes from Russia, Italy, Morocco, Italy and France.

A nice touch is her list of tips on how to cook healthier: Replace sour cream with soft tofu, use flavoured non-stick cooking oil spray, use red bell peppers for their vitamin C and beta carotene content. Use lots of fresh herbs to heighten taste, she says.

She also gives a selection of menus for the different holidays, including pareve, dairy, meat and vegetarian alternatives. The section for each holiday includes the historical background and food traditions.

Chanukah recipes are traditionally either dairy, in honour of Judith, who served the enemy Holofernes cheese until he got so thirsty and drank so much wine that he passed out and she could kill him, or fried foods, reminding us of the miracle of the oil. Here are a few examples from Festivals of Lite Kosher Cookbook.

CHERRY DAIRY KUGEL

8 oz. yolk-free noodles
8 oz. (1 cup) low fat cottage cheese, drained
½ cup nonfat sour cream or plain yogurt
½ cup pineapple juice concentrate
1 whole egg
5 egg whites
1 cup canned cherries, drained
1½ tsp. vanilla
½ tsp. almond extract
cooking spray

Topping
½ cup crushed corn flakes
3 tbsp. chopped toasted almonds

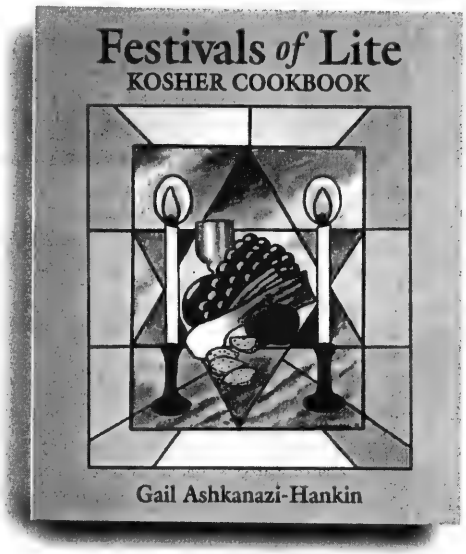
Boil the noodles according to package directions and drain.

In a bowl, combine the noodles with the remaining kugel ingredients except the spray.

Coat a 9-inch square glass baking dish with the cooking spray. Pour in the noodle mixture.

Combine topping ingredients and sprinkle over the noodle mixture.

Bake at 350 for 1 hour to 1 hour and 15 minutes. Serves 12.



CORNMEAL LATKES

½ cup egg substitute or 4 egg whites
2 cups nonfat sour cream or nonfat plain yogurt
2 tbsp. honey
1 cup whole-wheat pastry flour
1 cup cornmeal
1 tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. salt
Butter-flavoured cooking spray

Mix egg substitute, sour cream and honey. Stir in remaining ingredients except the spray.

Heat a griddle over medium-high heat. Coat with cooking spray.

Spoon batter onto the griddle in two batches of 9 pancakes, and lightly brown for about 1 to 2 minutes. Spray the tops with the cooking spray before turning, then brown another 1 to 2 minutes. Serves 9.

Try a cookie-making carnival before Chanukah

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

One of our favourite family traditions is our annual Chanukah cookie bake. This cookie-making carnival, usually a few days before Chanukah begins, is our family's way of getting ready for Chanukah.

I try to use at least three different types of cookie dough each year, as well as three or four different frostings or sprinkles.

BASIC BUTTER COOKIE DOUGH

4 sticks (1 pound) unsalted butter, softened
1⅓ cups sugar
¼ tsp. salt
3 large egg yolks
2 tsp.vanilla
4⅔ cups all-purpose flour

In large bowl of a standing electric mixer beat together butter, sugar and salt until light and fluffy. Beat in yolks, one at a time, and vanilla and beat until smooth. Beat in flour gradually, beating dough until just combined well. Chill for at least ½ hour.

Cut the dough into three or four portions and keep the portion that you aren't using covered and in the refrigerator.

Roll out the section of dough that you are using on a lightly floured surface to approximately ¼ to ⅓-inch thick and cut out in your desired shapes. Place the cookies on a cookie sheet and bake at 350 for 10 to 12 minutes. (I like to use parchment paper on my cookie sheets when I bake sugar/butter cookies. It prevents any sticking). Cool on racks; then frost.

You can sprinkle coloured sugar on top of the cookies before you bake them, but make sure you brush the top of the cookie with either egg white or milk (non-dairy creamer) before you sprinkle on the sprinkles. This will make the sprinkles adhere. Makes about 3 pounds of dough.

SPICED ICEBOX BUTTER COOKIES

½ prepared Basic Butter Cookie Dough recipe at room temperature
3 tbsp. honey or molasses
1 tbsp. cinnamon
2 tsp. ground ginger
1½ tsp. anise seeds, crushed lightly
½ tsp. ground cloves
¼ tsp. freshly grated nutmeg

Icing
1 cup confectioners' sugar
1½ tbsp. fresh lemon juice

In bowl of a standing electric mixer beat together the dough, honey or molasses, and spices until just combined well. Divide dough in half, and on sheets of wax paper, form each half into a 12-inch log. Chill logs, wrapped in wax paper, at least two hours or overnight. Preheat oven to 350. With a sharp knife cut logs into generous ⅛-inch slices and arrange ½ inch apart on baking sheets. Bake cookies in batches in middle of oven until pale golden, about 12 minutes, and cool on racks.

Make icing: In a small bowl whisk together icing ingredients and then transfer the icing to a sealable plastic bag. With scissors cut a ⅛-inch opening in one corner of bag.

Arrange cookies on sheets of wax paper and, using the plastic bag with the icing in it draw stars or dreidels on the cookies with the icing. Let icing dry completely. Cookies may be stored between layers of wax paper in airtight containers up to six weeks frozen. Makes about 10 dozen cookies.

ALMOND BUTTER ICING

Light almond flavoured icing, great for sugar and butter cookies. To keep it pareve you can use all margarine if you wish.

1 cup shortening
1 cup butter or margarine
4 to 5 cups sifted confectioners' sugar
4 to 5 tbsp. milk or non-dairy creamer
1½ tsp. almond extract

In a mixer or food processor cream together the shortening and the butter. Add the almond extract and beat until fluffy. Beat in the confectioners' sugar, one cup at a time. Add the milk alternately with the confectioners' sugar, one tablespoon at a time until the icing reaches the desired consistency. Colour and decorate as desired.

AUNT ZULA'S CHANUKAH CUTOUTS

This is an old-fashioned sugar cookie recipe that is not as sweet as others that I've used. They're great with a powdered sugar icing without being overly sweet.

1 cup shortening
1 cup confectioners' sugar
½ tsp. salt
2 eggs
2¾ cups all-purpose flour
3 tsp. baking powder
2 tbsp. milk or non-dairy creamer
1 tsp. vanilla extract

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl cream the sugar and shortening together. Add the eggs and the dry ingredients. Mix well. Add the milk or non-dairy creamer last. There's no need to chill this dough, simply roll out to ¼-inch thickness, cut out and bake 10-12 minutes. Makes 2 dozen.

Cookies a great treat for Chanukah

BROWN SUGAR COOKIES

2 cups all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. baking powder
1 pinch salt
½ cup butter or margarine, softened
1 egg
1 tbsp. heavy cream or non-dairy creamer
1½ tsp. vanilla extract
½ cup packed brown sugar

In a large mixing bowl, cream together the butter and brown sugar. Beat in the egg, heavy cream or non-dairy creamer, and vanilla. Slowly add in the flour, baking powder and salt. Mix until well blended. If dough seems too dry, add water, ½ teaspoon at a time.

Cover and refrigerate for four hours.

Preheat oven to 375. Roll out the dough on a floured surface to a thickness of ¼ of an inch. Cut with cookie cutters and place 1½ inches apart on cookie sheets. Bake 8 to 10 minutes, until lightly coloured.

CHOCOLATE CUTOUT COOKIE

1 cup butter or margarine
2 cups white sugar
3 eggs
3 tsp. vanilla extract
3 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
10 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder

In a large mixing bowl cream the butter or margarine and sugar until light and fluffy; add eggs, one at a time, beating well. Mix in the vanilla.

In a separate bowl combine flour, cocoa powder and baking powder. Add the flour mixture to the cream mixture and mix well. Wrap the dough in waxed paper and chill for two hours.

Preheat oven to 350. Divide the dough in half. Roll out each half to ¼ inch thick. Cut with desired shaped cookie cutters. Place on lightly greased cookie sheets and bake for 10-12 minutes. Makes 6 dozen.

CREAM CHEESE CUTOUTS

A fluffy cookie that tastes like a pastry.

1 cup butter or margarine, softened
1 (8 ounce) package of cream cheese, softened
½ cup sifted confectioners' sugar
2 cups all-purpose flour
¼ tsp. salt

In an electric mixer or food processor cream together the butter and cream cheese until fluffy. Then gradually blend in the sugar.

In a bowl mix together the flour and salt; stir the flour mixture into the creamed mixture. Cover; chill dough several hours or overnight.

Preheat oven to 375. Divide the dough into thirds. On lightly floured surface, roll out dough, one section at a time. (Keep the other sections refrigerated.) Cut out with cookie cutter to desired shapes. Place the cookies on an ungreased cookie sheet. Bake until firm, but not brown, about 12 minutes. If desired, sift additional confectioners' sugar over slightly warm cookies. Makes 5 dozen.

EZ ROLLED COOKIES

1 cup butter or margarine
1 cup white sugar
2 eggs
4 tbsp. milk
1 tsp. lemon flavouring
3 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. cream of tartar
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tbsp. white sugar
food colouring (if desired)

Cream together 1 cup white sugar and butter. Beat in the eggs, milk and flavouring. Sift flour, cream of tartar and baking soda. Stir into butter mixture.

Divide the dough in half and mix in 3 or 4 drops of food colouring to each half, if you're using food colouring. (Take half the dough out of the bowl, mix in the food colouring, wash the bowl and colour the remaining dough with the other colour.) Chill for a short time, until firm.

Roll out on lightly floured board and cut with your favourite cookie cutters. If you don't want to frost these cookies after they are baked, you can brush them with an egg with or milk or non dairy creamer and sprinkle with 1 tbsp. white sugar. Bake at 350 for 8 to 10 minutes. Makes 2 dozen.

BEST WHITE ICING EVER

This icing recipe is number 1! It's quick and easy to make, great for cakes and you can easily change the consistency by adding a little water or corn syrup. If you wish, use half shortening and half unsalted butter or all margarine.

4 cups confectioners sugar
1 cup shortening
2 tbsp. water
1 tsp. clear vanilla

In a large bowl, combine sugar, shortening, water and vanilla. Beat on low speed to combine, then beat on medium speed for a full five minutes. It won't look like icing at first, but keep the mixer going for a full five minutes, and then you're done!

If you're not using this for decorating, but just for icing a cake, thin the icing by adding 3 tbsp. of corn syrup, or water to the icing. Makes 4 to 5 cups.

Chanukah Delights

CJN staff helps create a perfect bowl of hot soup

Staff members of The Canadian Jewish News, many of whom are known for their culinary expertise, contributed the following soup recipes to enjoy when the weather is blustery.

VEGETARIAN ZUCCHINI SOUP

4 tbsp. butter or olive oil (or 2 tbsp. of each)
2 medium onions, chopped
6 small zucchini, diced
2 medium potatoes, peeled and diced
4 cups pareve chicken stock
2 carrots, diced (or 1 parsnip and 1 carrot)
2 sprigs parsley
pinch of oregano and basil
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper
2 sprigs fresh dill
1 tsp. dry mustard
1 clove of garlic

Melt butter in large saucepan. Sauté onions. Add remaining ingredients and simmer for 20 minutes or until potatoes are tender. Purée. Serve hot or cold. Freezes well.

CHICKEN SOUP LEILA

4 skinned chicken breasts with bone-in
2 onions, chunked
2 large carrots, sliced diagonally
2 ribs celery stalks, sliced diagonally
2 large parsnips, sliced diagonally
6 cloves of garlic, crushed and chopped
2 tbsp. rosemary
3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
3 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
1 tbsp. marjoram
salt and pepper to taste

Put chicken in large soup pot, preferably enamel. Add water about ¼ way up the pot. Bring to rolling boil over high heat. Remove as much scum as possible.

Add the rest of ingredients slowly. Stir. Lower heat to medium-low. Cook uncovered for one hour.

Put soup in the fridge overnight if possible. Remove fat before re-heating.

Serve with rice, farfel, soup nuts or matzah balls.

TOMATO EGGPLANT SOUP WITH COUSCOUS

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 leek, white part only
2 small eggplants, peeled and diced
1 can tomatoes, chopped
1 tbsp. tomato paste
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
½ tsp. dried oregano
½ tsp. dried thyme
5 cups chicken or vegetable stock
1 cup couscous cooked
salt and pepper
fresh basil leaves for garnish

In a large saucepan, heat oil over medium-high heat. Cook leek and eggplant until soft, about 3 minutes. Stir in tomatoes, tomato paste, basil, oregano and thyme.

Cook about 4 minutes. Add stock and simmer 30 minutes. Purée in a food processor. Return to pot and stir in couscous. Reheat if necessary. Taste for salt and pepper. Garnish with basil leaves. Serves 6 to 8.

ROASTED GARLIC TOMATO BISQUE

1 large onion, peeled, quartered olive oil
8 plum tomatoes, cored
1 bulb elephant garlic (much larger and sweeter than regular garlic)
2 tbsp. brown sugar
1 large can plum tomatoes, chopped, undrained
½ cup chicken or vegetable broth
Salt and pepper
6 fresh basil leaves, thinly sliced

Preheat broiler. Brush onion lightly with oil and broil until golden and slightly blackened on edges; remove and set aside.

Broil plum tomatoes until skin blisters. Remove, cool and peel off skin.

In saucepan, heat 1 tbsp. olive oil over medium heat.

Add onion, tomatoes and roasted garlic cloves, removed from bulb. (to roast garlic, trim top, brush with oil and bake at 350F for 45-60 minutes. Garlic pushes very easily out of skin)

Cook tomato mixture 2-3 minutes.

Add brown sugar. Stir and scrape bottom and sides of pan, being careful not to scorch as it caramelizes.

Add canned tomatoes and broth.

Stir occasionally, allowing soup to simmer on medium-low heat. Reduce by half. Using hand blender, purée hot soup, season with salt and pepper, or cool soup slightly and blend in food processor or blender.

Pour into individual serving bowls; garnish with basil. Serves 4.

SAVOURY SQUASH SOUP

2 medium butternut or acorn squash
½ cup (total) chopped leeks and carrots
¼ cup or oil or pareve margarine
1 bay leaf
8 cups vegetable or chicken stock
10 whole black peppercorns
Garnish:
⅓ cup squash (use cubed cooked squash from above)
⅓ cup cucumber peeled
¼ cup honey

Clean, peel and dice the squash. Set aside ⅓ cup. Clean and chop the leeks and carrots.

Heat margarine in pan, slightly sauté the squash, leeks and carrots. Don't brown! Add stock and bay leaf and bring to a boil, about 10 minutes. Add the peppercorns. Reduce heat and simmer for about 45 minutes, stirring to ensure nothing sticks to the pan.

Remove bay leaf and puree soup in a food processor, leaving small chunks of vegetables. Remove any whole peppercorns that do not break up. Add salt and additional pepper to taste.

Clean, peel and dice the cucumber. Ladle soup into individual bowls. Garnish with cucumber. Drizzle honey over the garnish in bowl. Serves 4-6.

Calgary's oldest synagogue marks 90th anniversary

By MAXINE FISCHBEIN
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Ninety years ago, when Calgary's first synagogue was founded, about 50 Jewish families made this city their home, and all of them worshipped at House of Jacob.

Today, there are four congregations in Calgary, but House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel (HOJMI, as the shul is now known, lives on.

It has been an exciting 90 years. At the beginning, House of Jacob was the hub from which grew all the spokes of the wheel that now comprise the Calgary Jewish community.

When it was founded in 1909 by Alberta Jewish pioneer Jacob Lyon Diamond, House of Jacob was the fourth organization in all of Alberta to be incorporated under the province's Societies Act, says Jay Joffe, president of the Jewish Historical Society of Alberta. In the Jewish community, it is only predated by the chevrah kadishah, which was formed in 1906.

The Jewish Historical Society has preserved many of the original documents pertaining to the shul's history, and for Joffe, the synagogue has special significance. He is the grandson of the late Jacob Diamond, whose efforts – including the very first pledge to the building fund – led to the construction of the congregation's first shul on 5th Avenue East.

Construction on the building, which cost $5,000, began in 1911, and the shul opened its doors in 1912.

Close to a century later, Joffe proudly displays the architectural drawings of University of Calgary architecture student Vance Harris, who has created a model of the original building for the historical society. The model, which will be lent to HOJMI during its 90th anniversary celebration, will afterward be put on permanent display at the Calgary Jewish Centre.

The drawings have been taken only from photographs and recollections of synagogue old-timers. The original plans for the shul, which was demolished in 1968 when the City of Calgary bought the property as part of an urban renewal plan, were lost along the way.

As one watches Joffe unfold the drawings, one easily conjures up the image of Diamond himself, poring over the blueprints of the "house" which bore his name and over which he presided as president for seven consecutive terms.

"The detail is amazing," says Joffe. "It was an enormous job to try to reconstruct the building from the pictures."

Native and long-term Calgarians all attest to the significance of the House of Jacob in Calgary's Jewish history.

Nearly every other Jewish institution in the city can trace its roots to the "house" that Jacob Diamond built. The House of Jacob spawned Calgary's first Hebrew school and, until 1935 when the Beth Israel congregation was formed, it was the only institution catering to the Jewish community's religious needs.

Two long-serving rabbis, Rabbi Shimon Smolensky and Rabbi David Barenholtz, were spiritual leaders of the shul from 1917-1935 and 1939-1968 respectively.

Calgarians have fond memories of the original House of Jacob. They remember the men davening in the downstairs sanctuary where the bimah was placed in the middle of the room, while the women looked on from the upstairs women's section.

Long-time Calgarian Elliott Zuckier has played many roles within the House of Jacob, but perhaps the most important one was his job as shadchan.

Although he had been a member of the House of Jacob following his marriage to Minnie in 1949, he, like many in the community who moved on to newer congregations, later joined the Shaarey Tzedec.

In the late 1970s, the then House of Jacob president, Meyer Blitt, approached Zuckier looking for help in breathing life back into the shul, which had declined in the years following World War II.

"They had problems getting a minyan," recalls Zuckier, who says that his main accomplishment during the transition period for the shul was to broker a marriage between something old and something new.

Zuckier introduced a few young couples who were looking for a more traditional Jewish path, to Blitt. A core group of about 20 couples joined House of Jacob.

At a meeting, they brought a rabbi from Yeshiva University with whom they discussed their vision for a revitalized Orthodox synagogue.

Subsequently, a benefactor from the East underwrote the cost of bringing Peter Hayman, a rabbinical student, to Calgary to lead holiday services for the once-again fledgling congregation.

Hayman, who was later ordained and served the shul as a full-time rabbi, is the individual who galvanized the movement toward a strong modern-Orthodox presence in Calgary.

Together with his old-new flock, Rabbi Hayman made the journey through a series of temporary synagogue accommodations, including the old Loyal Order of Eagles Lodge at 12th Street and 13th Avenue SW, which was the congregation's home from 1968 to 1981.

It moved first to a home on Palliser Drive, purchased by the Doctor and Parker families, then rented space in the Calgary Jewish Centre, and finally moved to its present location across from the centre where the new shul building was consecrated in 1986.

The name of the new shul was also a marriage of old and new. It became House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel in 1983, when the Koschitzky Foundation of Toronto made a generous donation in honor of Israel Koschitzky, who had served as a trustee of the congregation in 1957-58.

Eleanor and Labie Doctor are credited within the congregation as being among the key figures in the revitalization of the shul.

"We are in a unique situation. In cities across Western Canada, more traditional Orthodox communities have been diminishing," reflects Eleanor Doctor with obvious pride.

"Yet Calgary is now on the map as one of the only young, emerging Orthodox Jewish communities in Western Canada. There is a new shul, a new mikvah, a new bakery, a new school, a new butcher. Everything is new!"

Doctor sees HOJMI's role as being every bit as crucial to Jewish survival in Calgary as the original House of Jacob was.

"As a result of having an Orthodox community, we are better able to sustain a Jewish infrastructure that includes [the above mentioned services]."

"The congregation represents modern, mainstream Orthodox Judaism, which is open to all Jews seeking a more traditional expression of their Judaism," says Doctor, who acknowledges that most members of the congregation do not lead an Orthodox lifestyle.

Current HOJMI co-presidents Nelson Halpern and Harold Lipton, both of whom were raised in Calgary, are charged with guiding the shul into the future.

"It is remarkable," reflects Lipton, "that an institution as old as 90 years still continues to play a leading role in the community. It has undergone a remarkable transformation. Far from being an old-fashioned, irrelevant congregation, it has transformed itself into a vibrant movement with appeal for people of all ages."

Current HOJMI spiritual leader, Rabbi Seth Binus, characterizes HOJMI as "striving to offer a modern application of traditional beliefs and values."

"The shul has gone through a lot of changes in its long history. It takes a strong community for people to grow and persevere through so many years, and I'm very proud of such a community," says Rabbi Binus.

Bertha Gold, whose husband Abe was asked to preside over the congregation in 1981-82, a pivotal time in the shul's recent history, is one of those who looks forward to the celebration of House of Jacob's first 90 years.

"It will carry on another 90 years, and I hope, from strength to strength."

MP Cotler calls for increased social spending

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Newly elected MP Irwin Cotler wants Ottawa to put half of the $100-billion surplus projected by Finance Minister Paul Martin into social spending, such as health care, education and social security.

Cotler wants another 25 percent to go toward retiring the debt, and the amount saved in interest payments should also be used for social spending. Only the remaining quarter should provide tax relief, and then only to low and middle-income earners.

Cotler firmly positioned himself on the left wing of the Liberal party during the byelection in Mount Royal, which saw him capture 92.3 percent of the vote, possibly setting a Canadian record in federal politics. The major theme of his campaign was replenishing what he calls the "social rights basket."

He said a child poverty rate in Canada of 20 percent is a "disgrace" and the fact that the rate is double among blacks is a "scandal." He wants the government to put more effort into eliminating discrimination against minorities, especially in employment, and he says addressing the grievances of aboriginals must be a "national responsibility," and not left to the First Nations themselves.

He also is pushing for more protection of the environment.

The 59-year-old longtime McGill University law professor was expected to win. Mount Royal has been Liberal since it was created in 1940 but he said he was stunned that he received 16,408 of the 17,778 of the ballots cast.

Moreover, the magnitude of his victory was virtually uniform at all 186 polls, and not just in the heavily Jewish areas of Côte St. Luc and Hampstead, where he was expected to get overwhelming support. The riding also includes Town of Mount Royal and parts of Snowdon and Côte des Neiges, whose populations are multi-ethnic.

At 11 polls, he shut out the other three candidates, and at least six others, there was just a single vote not for Cotler. His closest rival was Jamaican Association president Noel Alexander.

The turnout was low at 28.5 percent, even for a byelection, and especially surprising in Mount Royal, where voter turnout is traditionally around 80 percent, even though a Liberal win is a foregone conclusion.

Although there has been speculation Cotler will be appointed to the cabinet, he emphasized that was never a condition of his running.

"My nomination came from the grassroots…There was never any discussion with the prime minister or any one else in the government, nor any understanding, before or since my nomination, about a cabinet post," Cotler stated.

Nevertheless, he said he has received "very encouraging support" from Jean Chrétien after his nomination and election. The prime minister phoned him from Turkey after the election.

He knows the Jewish community will expect him to defend Israel, when necessary. He may not go as far as some would like though, he said.

Cotler said he supports an independent state for the Palestinians, as long as Israel can "live in peace and security, free of any acts or threats of force."

Although officially on a leave of absence from McGill, he will continue to teach there, he said. He will be giving one two-hour seminar per week each semester.

"There's no conflict of interest. On the contrary, I believe it dovetails with what I hope to accomplish in Parliament. I teach human rights. I need the interaction with students and faculty to keep up to date with what's going on."

Call to fight child poverty

OTTAWA — The Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, the Canadian Islamic Congress, and Citizens for Public Justice, a Christian public policy organization, have jointly called on the federal government to tackle the problem of child poverty.

The three groups appeared together before the House of Commons finance committee earlier this month. They each gave a broad outline of what their faith traditions say about children and poverty, and urged the government to take action in its upcoming budget and establish other policies to address child poverty.

Thousands of Canadians in over 50 cities and towns across the country were scheduled to take part in vigils on Nov. 23 and 24 to protest child poverty.

Citizens for Public Justice says the vigils marked the 10th anniversary of a federal government promise to eliminate child poverty by 2000.

Ten years later, 463,000 – or 60 percent – more children live in poverty, the group says.

"We join so many other faith and community groups in supporting the need for a national, co-ordinated, governmental plan to alleviate poverty and improve the life-chances of children," Gabrielle Mandell, social action co-ordinator at the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, told the Commons committee.

"In Jewish tradition, the pursuit of social justice is the responsibility of every person and of the social institutions and government structures, which we develop as part of living in community," Mandell told the committee. "Helping those in need is not a matter of choice, but a matter of justice.

"To give voluntarily to funds for the poor and disadvantaged is a personal decision of charity. Jewish tradition has framed such giving as part of a more compulsory and structured system of communal giving. The public sector has a key role in promoting economic justice and to do justice by just means.

"We contend that:

- The good of the community is the responsibility of all its members;
- The disadvantaged and vulnerable members of society must be protected and assisted;
- Every person must contribute to the welfare of the community according to his or her capacity and capabilities;
- Human dignity must be respected and must pervade all forms of service and action;
- Individuals must be provided with the tools necessary for progress toward self-sufficiency.

"These statements express some of our fundamental tenets. They are premised on the recognition that fiscal policy has moral dimensions," Mandell said.

"We are here today, because as a society, we have failed to live up to our responsibilities and commitments to Canada's children and their families.

"Our faith tradition does not permit us to stand by while one in five children in Canada lives in poverty. Their families go without the necessities of ensuring the healthy development of the next generation.

"We are bound, not only to respond, but also to do so sensitively and in ways which respect human dignity and develop human potential.

"Jewish tradition tells us: 'You are not obliged to finish the task, neither are you free to neglect it.' (Pirkei Avot) What is needed is a real commitment now, a multi-year plan, which will lay the foundation for ongoing action."

Ohr Somayach Toronto

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

From the day Jean Chretien was first sworn in as prime minister back in 1993, the most popular political pastime in Ottawa has been idle speculation about when he would step down as leader.

Events of the day would always be analyzed on two levels. The first would be to take the issue at its face value. But inevitably, pundits and journalists would sift through the particular development looking for clues regarding Chretien's intentions.

One would have thought that everyone would tire of this tea leaf gazing exercise, but then one has to remember that we are discussing Ottawa politics – the very definition of virtual reality. If anything, contemplation of Jean Chretien's future has become a firmly entrenched element of Parliament's political culture.

Now, however, in a manner reminiscent of the habitual gambler caught once again, we can say that recent developments really are different! And, if current murmurs prove accurate, we can draw two firm conclusions. The first is that the "little guy from Shawinigan" is as shrewd a politician as one can find anywhere. Second, that one may as well drink the tea, because the Right Honourable Member for Saint Maurice has no plans to vacate his cozy Sussex Drive digs.

First, let's look at some recent evidence. In the Summer Shuffle, Paul Martin was denied a chance for a 'fresh start' in a new portfolio. Instead of developing a new persona, Martin will be relegated to his "familiar" seat while frontline minister colleagues capture headlines for all the new programs they will launch on the back of his past efforts.

In a series of leaked reports, it is apparent that tensions between the Martin and Chretien camps have increased, and public attacks by Chretien supporters on the Martinites have escalated considerably since last month.

Another clue, was Chretien's decision to postpone almost half of his travel plans over the next few months – a sure sign that he wants to be home to consolidate his hold on the caucus.

But the "smoking gun" was in the announcement that John Rae has formally begun to assemble the Chretien team for the 2001 general election. Rae headed up all of Chretien's previous campaigns and many of the same key players are back for the next round.

The safe money is on Chretien returning to seek a third majority government. Next week, we will look at the reason why.

Hezbollah warns of attacks on Israel

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Hezbollah may launch attacks against Israel if the Jewish state unilaterally withdraws from southern Lebanon without reaching prior agreements with Syria and Lebanon.

The warning appeared in the Saudi Arabian news weekly al-Majalla, which interviewed Hezbollah's deputy leader, Sheik Na'im Kassem.

Kassem did not explicitly say that Hezbollah would carry the fight into northern Israel, but he noted that a unilateral Israeli pullout would leave the "area" open to all eventualities.

Citing the major factors that would determine events after an Israeli withdrawal, he referred to the future of the Golan Heights and the fate of Palestinian refugees in Lebanon.

Kassem's remarks followed a warning by sources close to Hezbollah recently that there would be no stability in the region if the problem of Palestinian refugees in Lebanon remains unresolved.

While Hezbollah has yet to state outright whether it would continue its attacks after an Israeli withdrawal, Kassem's comments are thought to be the most dire to emerge on the subject from the fundamentalist group's leadership.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak has repeatedly pledged to withdraw the Israeli army from southern Lebanon by the middle of next year.

The pledge came in the wake of Israeli protests over the nation's growing casualties in the region.

But, according to Kassem, a withdrawal may not stem those losses.

Talk in Israel about a withdrawal is "linked to the magnitude of the losses and Israel's capacity to absorb them. Suffering losses today might be better for Israel than a withdrawal, which could lead to bigger losses if there is no agreement."

The Israelis "face a choice between bad and worse," he added.

A complete Israeli withdrawal – without an agreement over the refugees and the Golan – would leave "the picture confused and the results unknown in their details," said Kassem.

"Developments could occur that would render such a withdrawal full of negative factors for Israel."

But he told al-Majalla he did not believe Israel was in a position to decide now what it will do next year.

"It is necessary to wait and see whether Syrian-Israeli negotiations resume in the coming months and whether they make progress. The answer to these questions will determine the nature of the withdrawal from Lebanon," he said.

Israeli officer critical of liberal Jews

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israeli army has condemned an officer for telling an audience of soldiers that Judaism's Conservative and Reform streams have been more harmful to the Jews than the Holocaust.

"The expressions of the officer toward Reform and Conservative Jews have no place in an army address," the army said in a statement.

Lieut. Gamliel Peretz, who now faces a formal army investigation, was quoted as telling a group of soldiers he did not consider people affiliated with the Reform and Conservative movements Jewish, and that the two movements "led to the assimilation of eight million Jews, which is worse than the Holocaust."

Peretz made the remarks last week during a lecture on the status of women in the Torah and in Judaism in front of a group of about 60 soldiers.

When two soldiers, affiliated with the Conservative movement, objected to the officer's statements, Peretz reportedly said he could express his opinions, especially if they are rooted in fact.

Peretz's remarks drew calls for his immediate removal from any command positions.

Among those condemning the statements were Education Minister Yossi Sarid, a member of the Meretz Party.

Rabbi Ehud Bandel, the president of the Masorti movement, as the Conservative stream is known in Israel, accused Peretz of slander, adding that he had breached his authority and abused his position.

France to compensate Holocaust orphans

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — The orphans of Jews deported from France to Nazi death camps will receive compensation from the French government, Prime Minister Lionel Jospin has announced.

Addressing Jewish leaders, Jospin said the orphans would receive either a lump sum or a monthly pension of about $500, under a program to be put in place in the coming weeks.

"My belief is that the unique situation of the children orphaned by the deportations, who suffered from the loss of one and often two parents and lived under the threat of arrest and deportation, calls for a response worthy of the republic 50 years on," Jospin said recently at the annual dinner of CRIF, the umbrella group of secular French Jewish organizations.

"We feel it is fair that France assume its responsibilities toward those who were mistreated and ruined," said Jospin, the guest of honor at the CRIF dinner, which was attended by cabinet ministers, religious leaders and foreign ambassadors.

The measure represented a triumph for famed Nazi-hunter Serge Klarsfeld, who has been campaigning for decades on behalf of Holocaust orphans, particularly the children of foreign Jews deported from France, who have never received any kind of restitution.

Most of the 76,000 Jews deported from France during World War II were immigrants from eastern Europe.

"The French state of 1940 helped the Nazis deprive thousands of Jewish children of their parents, stole their childhood and plunged their entire existence into mourning," Klarsfeld said.

"The French state of 1999 appeases at last the orphans in their old age through this moral and material compensation, which will help many of them escape poverty," he said.

Some 3,000 to 5,000 people will be eligible for the compensation, Klarsfeld said.

CRIF President Henri Hajdenberg praised the initiative, but urged Jospin to act quickly because of the advanced age of most of the survivors.

"This measure must be implemented very rapidly so that those concerned can still benefit from it," he said.

At the CRIF dinner, Jospin spoke out on behalf of 13 Iranian Jews who were detained by Tehran earlier this year on charges of spying for Israel.

"It is clear to the French authorities that there can be no return by Iran to the international community if that country executes these 13 people," Jospin said.

"That is why I express the wish that the changes underway in Iran lead to the acquittal of the 13 Iranian Jews as a first symbolic act."

Iran responded to Jospin's remarks by accusing France of meddling in its internal affairs.

Jospin and French President Jacques Chirac discussed the fate of the 13 last month with visiting Iranian President Mohammed Khatami.

At the time, Khatami promised that the detainees would be given a fair trial.

Jewish groups staged protests during Khatami's Oct. 27 and 28 visit. They were demanding the release of the 13.

Human rights groups also demonstrated to protest Iran's human rights abuses.

France has for years maintained diplomatic and commercial ties with Iran, despite Tehran's support for terrorism and the murder of Iranian opposition leaders on French soil.

State of emergency may end

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel may soon cancel the state of emergency that has been in effect since the state was founded.

"Today the government approved the request to extend" the order for a state of emergency "by only six months, a move it has never asked the Knesset to do. It generally asks that the order be extended by a year," Justice Minister Yossi Beilin told Israel Radio on Sunday.

"The significance is that in another half-year, we will inform the Knesset we do not intend to extend the order – and there will be no more state of emergency in Israel," he added after the cabinet discussed the order during its weekly meeting.

Beilin has previously described the nation's legal state of emergency as a "preposterous" situation.

Other critics have said the emergency order gives the government far-reaching powers and enables it to pass legislation that violates civil rights.

Perhaps the most controversial aspect of the order is that it allows for administrative detentions, under which individuals suspected of terrorism or subversion can be jailed without formal charges being brought against them.

Under the order, the government can also prevent essential public sector workers from striking.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 15

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak offered the governorship of the Bank of Israel to an economic professor currently teaching at Harvard University. It was not clear if Elhanan Helpman, formerly of Tel Aviv University, had agreed to accept the post. The bank's current president, Jacob Frenkel, resigned after nine years in the post.

• Israel postponed its planned withdrawal from an additional five percent of the West Bank as a result of a dispute between Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat regarding the withdrawal maps.

Nov. 16

• An Israeli field hospital began operating in Turkey to provide treatment for the survivors of last week's earthquake in the northwestern part of the country. (Israeli rescuers subsequently helped save a woman who had been trapped under rubble since last Friday.)

• The corruption trial of Shimon Sheves, former director general of the Prime Minister's Office under Yitzhak Rabin, began.

Nov. 17

• The Absorption Ministry announced it will draw up a long-term program to help ease problems faced by the nation's Ethiopian immigrants. According to a report issued by the ministry, about 18 percent of Ethiopian families have one parent and about 60 percent of families have five or more children.

Nov. 18

• The Vatican confirmed Pope John Paul II will begin a visit to Israel on March 24.

• In response to news of rising unemployment, Barak reaffirmed his election promise to create 300,000 jobs.

Nov, 19

• The United States told Israel that it does not intend, "in the foreseeable future," to remove Syria from the list of states that support terrorism.

• Barak told world leaders in Istanbul that, in a referendum, Israelis would vote overwhelmingly for peace.

TIMERMAN DEAD AT 76: Argentine journalist Jacobo Timerman recently died at the age of 76 from a heart attack.

Barak spoke of the relationship between Israel and the Jewish world as a two-way street, and praised the new Birthright Israel program, a joint Israel-Diaspora venture.

"I thank you for your work," he said, "and I trust that as you make your allocations, Israel will remain a top priority, and more resources will be sent our way.

"We share a Jewish heart, a Jewish soul, a Jewish future. Let's resolve together to renew our sense of community and our unbreakable commitment to each other."

Barak's address last Friday capped a series of meetings and sessions that focused mainly on the four "pillars" of the United Jewish Communities (UJC), the entity formed this year by the merger of United Jewish Appeal, United Israel Appeal, and the Council of Jewish Federations (under whose auspices the GA used to be run).

The UJC, representing 189 Jewish federations in North America, has four underlying tracks, known as pillars: Jewish renaissance and renewal, referring to a vision of communities built on Torah, tzedek and chesed; human services and social policy, to strengthen support for the needy; Israel and overseas; and campaign and financial resource development.

A less prominent, but definitely resonant, aspect of the GA was the issue of religious pluralism, alluded to more circumspectly as unity.

Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israel's minister for Israeli Society and World Jewish Communities (a newly created position), addressed the pluralism issue at the opening plenary and at a reported 44 meetings over three days.

The eighth-generation Danish-born rabbi – who continued to serve as chief rabbi of Oslo, Norway, after making aliyah with his family in 1986 – shared some personal thoughts at the opening plenary, striking an obvious chord with the audience.

Under his leadership, the Oslo Jewish community has become "vibrant," with Jewish education reaching the 95 percent rate and 70 percent of Jewish youth spending a year in Israel after high school.

"This could only be obtained because we were a community of inclusivity... yes, also the mixed couples," Rabbi Melchior said.

Rabbi Donniel Hartman, associate director of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, also spoke at the opening plenary, emphasizing the need for "multiple access points" to Judaism. "We will not be united by a common answer," he said.

Other prominent GA speakers included U.S. vice-president Al Gore at the opening plenary – with a speech peppered with Jewish references and affirming strong support for Israel; Alice Shalvi, rector of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem; Rabbi Irving Greenberg, president of Chaverim Kol Yisrael/Jewish Life Network; educator Arna Poupko of Montreal; Rabbi Naamah Kelman, director, Education Initiatives, Hebrew Union College, Jerusalem; MKs Naomi Blumenthal and Yuli Tamir; Ariel Sharon, leader of Israel's opposition Likud party; and Richard Joel, president of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

More on the GA next week.

Croatia's president confounds, comforts his country's Jews

Second of two parts

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

ZAGREB, Croatia — President Franjo Tudjman, the father of modern Croatia, has confounded and comforted the Jews of this economically-depressed Balkan nation.

Tudjman, who recently called new elections for Dec. 22, has compiled an ambivalent record insofar as Croatia's fascist past and the Holocaust are concerned.

In 1941, on the heels of Germany's invasion of Yugoslavia, Croatia declared statehood under the leadership of Ante Pavelic, a fascist and anti-Semite who was at the head of the xenophobic Ustashe movement. Pavelic's regime, aligned with Germany and Italy, persecuted and murdered Serbs, Jews and Gypsies.

Many of the victims died in Jasenovac, a Croatian concentration camp whose commander, Dinko Sakic, was recently sentenced to 20 years in prison.

Tudjman, a 77-year-old former Communist and anti-fascist partisan fighter who is said to be afflicted with incurable stomach cancer, assumed power in 1990, a year before Croatia seceded from the Yugoslavian federation and won independence yet again.

In a book entitled Wastelands of History, Tudjman raised eyebrows by claiming that 900,000 rather than six million Jews had been killed in the Holocaust. Adding insult to injury, he reportedly said he was pleased not to have married a Serb or a Jew.

Stung by domestic and international criticism, Tudjman apologized, claiming he had been misunderstood. He deleted his egregious reference to the Holocaust in the revised edition of Wastelands of History.

Since then, Tudjman and his foreign minister, Mate Granic, have tried to make amends by condemning the Holocaust, racism and anti-Semitism.

However, in line with his policy of reinterpreting Croatia's unsavory past, Tudjman suggested that the Ustashe, though it had been wrong to persecute minorities, deserved praise for having created an independent state after centuries of foreign domination.

Not content to leave matters there, Tudjman proposed that Jasenovac be turned into a memorial for all the victims of fascism, communism and the wars with Serbia in 1991, 1992 and 1995.

Tudjman has since dropped his controversial plan for Jasenovac. But few Croatians have suggested that two of Croatia's most visible national symbols expropriated by the Ustashe– the red-and-white coat of arms and the currency known as the kuna – should be cast aside or renamed.

Franjo Tudjman

Croatian Jewish leaders, from Zagreb to Dubrovnik, are painfully aware of Tudjman's propensity for revisionism. And while they believe that he is pandering to far-right elements in his party by promoting a certain nostalgia for the Ustashe era, they do not think he is an anti-Semite.

Ognjen Kraus, president of Zagreb's community, expressed incredulity that a government commission placed the number of Croatian Jews murdered in the Holocaust at only several hundred. "It's playing around with history," he said in an interview, tempering his observation with the consoling thought that its conclusion is not representative of official policy.

Kraus, a medical doctor whose son Ilan lives in Toronto, lambasted Tudjman for having allegedly insinuated that Croatia should be an ethnically homogeneous state. "This idea belongs to the last century. The majority of Croats do not support this crazy idea."

It is an oft-heard accusation. United Nations war crimes prosecutors and observers of the 1995 Dayton accord, which ended the war in neighbouring Bosnia, have levelled two charges against Tudjman. The first is that he devised a scheme to eradicate Bosnian Muslims and annex their lands to Croatia. The second is that he opposes the return of Serbs to Croatia as a way of consolidating his grip on the country. Whether true or not, these allegations have had the effect of isolating Croatia internationally and exacerbating its economic problems, first and foremost of which is an unemployment rate of 19 percent.

Zoran Morpurgo, scion of an old Sephardi family and president of the Jewish community in Split, takes a far more benign view of Tudjman. "He is excellent for Jews," Morpurgo noted, citing Tudjman's generally cordial relations with Jews, his help in renovating Split's venerable synagogue and his decision to assist Bosnian Jewish refugees.

"It's politically smart to be philo-Semitic," he observed. "Everyone in this region, Croats and Serbs, is trying to prove how good they are for Jews. It's good for their image."

Tudjman seems to understand this. He has appointed Jews to his cabinet – Economy Minister Nenad Porges and Health Minister Andrija Hebrang. And the managing director of the state-owned oil company, Ina, Davor Stern, is a Jew.

Croatia, too, has established diplomatic relations with Israel, although Israel has yet to open an embassy in Zagreb. For the moment, Israel's resident ambassador to Austria is accredited to Croatia.

Tudjman is plainly interested in courting Israel. Last month, Croatia's ambassador in Tel Aviv, Svjetlan Berkovic, announced that Tudjman will visit Israel shortly in a bid to reinforce military and commercial ties.

Stojan De Prato, a Jewish journalist in Zagreb who writes for the mass-circulation newspaper Vecernji List, explained that Tudjman courts Israel partly out of a calculated desire to burnish his credentials in the Jewish world.

Tudjman certainly endeared himself to Jews by quickly rebuilding Zagreb's Jewish community centre, bombed in August 1991. It is unclear whether this was an unmitigated act of anti-Semitism or simply a Serb provocation designed to tar Croatia during the fog of war. In any event, no one has been arrested in connection with the crime.

Igor Francetic, vice-president of the community in Zagreb, holds that anti-Semitism is not a particularly pressing problem in Croatia today. "There is no more or less anti-Semitism here than in surrounding countries," he said. Ana Lebl, a Jewish activist in Split, agreed with his appraisal.

Ironically, one of the chief anti-Semitic propagandists in Croatia is Mladen Schwartz, a Jew who glorifies the Ustashe. "He is nuts," said Julia Kos, the librarian in Zagreb's Jewish library. "The world is full of fools."

Tudjman also gets full marks for extraditing and trying Dinko Sakic. Yet there is a gnawing suspicion that he pursued Sakic under American and Israeli pressure. Dean Friedrich, secretary-general of Zagreb's Jewish community, called the proceedings an indictment of a single war criminal rather than of the Ustashe itself.

According to Kraus, Tudjman has assured the community that Jewish properties confiscated by Ustashe and Communist regimes will be restored to their rightful owners.

Sheldon Kirshner was invited to Croatia last month by the Croatian National Tourist Office in New York and Lufthansa Airlines.

Chanukah Gifts

G-G-Award winner among many great gifts

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The following is a review of some books that would make excellent gifts for Chanukah.

Rembrandt's Eyes, by Simon Schama (Random House, $75) is a large and lavishly illustrated celebration of the renowned Dutch painter, who is to painting what Shakespeare is to writing.

Rembrandt has been hailed as a genius, but our knowledge of his life, like that of Shakespeare's, is as dark around the edges as a typical Rembrandt canvas. Schama, a brilliant historian-biographer, closely examines the artist's historic and cultural milieu, and draws a stunningly rich biography from the pictures themselves, in prose that is lively and accessible.

What particularly endears Rembrandt to Jewish audiences is his reverence for the Bible, biblical subjects and the Jewish people. He lived close to the Jewish section in Amsterdam, and often went there to sketch Jews.

Besides such famous works as The Nightwatch and his multiple Self Portraits, he immortalized many Old Testament scenes in such works as Abraham Serving the Three Angels, Jacob Blessing the Sons of Joseph, and Balaam and the Ass.

Other compositions, featuring Moses, Isaac, Samson, David and Belshazzar, are also reproduced and discussed.

"He was, after all, an enthusiast of the exotic, and his instinctive sense of the Scriptures, not least the Old Testament, as a living book of stories could only have been reinforced by his closeness to the people of the Book," Schama writes.

The Oxford Book of Hebrew Short Stories ($25.95), edited by Glenda Abramson, was recently released in paperback. This collection offers the works of established authors like A.B. Yehoshua, Amos Oz and David Grossman, as well as many lesser known scribes in translation. Beginning with Mendele Mokher Sefarim, the range of authors traces the historic rise of modern literary Hebrew.

This book includes an insightful introduction by the editor and informative capsule biographies of each of the 32 contributors. With this book, the esteemed Oxford University Press puts its stamp of approval, on modern Hebrew.

Elizabether and After, by Matt Cohen (Knopf, $32.95), won a Governor General's Award. Cohen's latest novel is set in the place he knows best, his habitual literary terrain near Kingston. The story focuses on Elizabeth McKelvey, killed in a car crash, and whose memory still inhabits the town of West Gull (population 684) where she had lived for three years, and been loved.

Parchment is the annual journal of Contemporary Canadian Jewish writings. Fresh off the press, the latest issue of Parchment is a volume of more than 200 pages (the biggest ever), featuring a bumper crop of short stories, poetry, essays and interviews.

Short-story authors include Lilian Nattel and Nora Gold, respective authors of The River Midnight and Marrow (an anthology of short stories). Shel Krakofsky and Seymour Mayneare among the poets.

The 1999-2000 issue of Parchment attests to the wealth of talent in the Canadian Jewish literary community. It is available at Jewish bookstores or by sending a cheque for $12 (one year) or $20 (two years) to Parchment, Centre for Jewish Studies, Vanier 260, York University, 4700 Keele St., North York, M3J 1P3.

Sulha, by Malka Marom (Key Porter, $27.95), is this Toronto author's first novel. The book centres on Leora, an Israeli war widow now living in Canada, who returns to Israel to discover the enemy that her son might have to face as a pilot in the Israeli Air Force. For a time, Leora lives with a remote Bedouin clan deep in the Sinai desert, as she seeks the meaning of the Arabic and Hebrew word Sulha – which means forgiveness, reconciliation, peace.

The author is a well-known folksinger and producer of radio documentaries, including the prize-winning The Bedouins.

Joseph, a children's book by Brian Wildsmith (Oxford, $16.50), is an abridged retelling of the story of Joseph. The language is simple, with a minimum of text, and there are delightful illustrations across each two-page spread.

This likeable, colourful book will invite children to use their imaginations as they pore pleasurably over each page. It's the sort of bedtime reading that parents will also enjoy.

Books capture Jewish past

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Jews of Europe who perished during the Holocaust cannot be brought back. But thanks to a dedicated corps of photographers, they have not been completely forgotten.

Two coffee-table volumes published earlier this month take us back to an era when Jewish communities flourished despite poverty, anti-Semitism, wars and political instability.

The books are Polyn: Jewish Life in the Old Country (Metropolitan) by Alter Kacyzne and Children of a Vanished World (University of California Press), edited by Mara Vishniac Kohn and Miriam Hartman Flacks.

Polyn celebrates the work of Kacyzne, a Jewish photographer from Warsaw who travelled around Poland from 1921 onward photographing shtetls, Jewish neighbourhoods and Jewish faces.

His stark black-and-white photos appeared in the Forverts, New York City's Yiddish Daily Forward, but gathered dust for more than six decades after publication.

An old market in Poland.

Kacyzne's photographs did not survive World War II, and he died in the Ukrainian city of Tarnapol in 1941. However, a small fraction of his photos, those commissioned by the Forverts, survived. For years they lay undisturbed in the archives of the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research in Manhattan.

A central figure in Warsaw's Yiddish cultural milieu born in Wilno in 1885, Kacyzne was a restless man who roamed the length and breadth of Poland to complete the assignment the Forverts had given him.

The photographs bear the hallmarks of a craftsman whose sole ambition was to preserve reality at any given moment.

And so a reader is given a bird's-eye view of Jewish districts in Rzeszow and Wilnow, a courtyard in Warsaw, a muddy lane in Falenica, and a wooden synagogue in Horochow.

Kacyzne's photographs of people are just as arresting: women and children in Czortkow; boys in a Lublin yeshiva; a bearded teacher in Biala Podalska; an elderly tavern keeper and his wife in Suchostow; a linen weaver in Wawolnica.

The photographs are not meant to be nostalgic, but because of the Holocaust, they evoke a measure of sentimentality.

Roman Vishniac's name is irretrievably associated with photography that distilled the essence of pre-Holocaust Jewish communities in eastern Europe: A Vanished World and To Give Them Light: The Legacy of Roman Vishniac.

Now, in Children of a Vanished World, his photographs focus on a particularly poignant subject – the young, innocent generation murdered by the Nazis and their local accomplices.

A pastiche of images, the book shows children at play and studying. For the most part, these youngsters radiate a purity and an innocence that is heartbreaking. They died before they could grow into adulthood, their all-too-brief lives snuffed out in a senseless fury of violence.

In essence, they are representative portraits of the one million Jewish children brutally killed during the Holocaust.

The photographs are accompanied by a selection of nursery rhymes, songs, poems and chants for children's games in both Yiddish and English translation.

Antique Judaica a rare treat at Harbourfront

By SUZANNE WINTROB
Special to the CJN

Twelve years ago, Tibor Verebes owned the only Judaica store in Hungary. But when he fled his birthplace for the security of Toronto, he left behind his entire priceless collection of antique Jewish artifacts.

"Collectors search for rare Judaica because they want to conserve our lost past," says Verebes, owner of V&V Antiques (www.iprimus.ca/~vandvantiques) at Toronto's Harbourfront Antique Market.

"Judaica is one of the hardest antique items to find because they, too, were lost. It wasn't just six million Jews who died – these precious pieces disappeared too."

Verebes is one of a handful of vendors who sell antique Judaica at Harbourfront Antique Market. His pieces, most of which come from eastern Europe and which date back to the 1860s, include several yadayim (silver hands used during the Torah reading), an etrog box, Chanukah menorahs, seder plates, spice boxes and a Torah cover. They're not for the bargain shopper; pieces range from $500 to $2,000.

Verebes is known among the market vendors as a serious Judaica collector and is often called upon to advise on rare finds. The power of each piece, though, makes it hard to let go.

"When I sell a piece of Judaica, I realize that I may never see that piece again," says Verebes, whose dream is to own paintings by artists Isidor Kaufman and Maurycy Gottlieb.

Tremendous emotional power

Josephine Liss Ohayon (www.ohayonantiques.com) understands. Owner of a neighbouring stall, Ohayon's Judaica pieces include an Austro-Hungarian spice tower (circa 1870), a collection of Russian silver Kiddush cups from Moscow's Czarist era, a Limoges seder plate from the 1920s, and an oil-on-canvas Hungarian portrait.

"Given their history, these pieces have tremendous emotional power," says Ohayon, who once returned from Paris with a rare ceramic seder plate tucked securely into her lap to ensure it survived the flight intact.

"Each piece is unique. But the hard part is finding them. There isn't a lot (of antique Judaica) out there and people who have it don't want to part with it."

Maybe that's why many vendors hide their Judaica pieces among the other antiques they have on display at their booths. Only a trained eye will notice a menorah and a Kiddush cup among the jewelry and objects d'arts in the dozens of showcases at the Harbourfront Antique Market.

Most people interested in Judaica are serious art collectors. Many are visitors from the United States, and not all of them are Jewish. Some know what they're looking for, while others are looking for anything they can get their hands on.

Perhaps it's the 18th-century Sabbath oil lamp at Heritage Gallery, which once hung in a Polish synagogue. Maybe it's a pair of 1880 Austro-Hungarian silver Shabbat candlesticks in the showcase at Cynthia Findlay Antiques. It could be the sterling handcrafted dreidel on display at Adornments by Shirley Ann Larman.

But then again, maybe it's not even on display at all. From behind his desk, the owner of Edward Koren's Antiques quietly shows a visitor a delicate black-and-white prayer shawl with an ornate sterling silver atarah (collar). Koren guesses it's from 1920s Poland or Hungary; he hopes to gain some insight into its heritage from his local rabbi.

"These pieces are like a part of me," says Koren, who was born in Russia just after World War II and lived in Israel for 15 years. "When I find some special pieces, I don't bother trying to sell them quickly. I like to keep them with me just a little bit longer."

Prince of Egypt and An American Tail

Cartoons make great gifts

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The holiday period is almost upon us and if you wish to get someone a special gift, there are several videos I can suggest for that purpose.

The most recent video available is Prince of Egypt. This animated retelling of the story of Exodus is a superb production. No expense was spared in bringing this marvellous story to the big screen.

The Prince of Egypt is out on video.

The animation is first class, rivaling anything the Disney studios have produced. And the voices feature some of the biggest stars in Hollywood, including Val Kilmer, Patrick Stewart, Ralph Fiennes, Jeff Goldblum, Natalie Portman, Sandra Bullock and Mel Brooks.

The music has been integrated into the film so flawlessly, it works better in the film than when heard on its own.

This was a film I saw several times in the theatres and I was still eager to see it again on video. And in some ways, I feel that some of the scenes rival those done in such live action spectaculars as The Ten Commandments.

Although Prince of Egypt is animated, it is really directed towards older children and adults, who might find it more entertaining than very young children.

An American Tail has been called the first "Jewish Christmas" film — mainly because it was originally released at Christmas. But the story is anything but Christmasy.

It's about a Jewish mouse named Fievel. A pogrom forces Fievel and his family out of their home in an East European shtetl and to immigrate to the United States.

In some ways the story told in An American Tail is more human than if it had been about people.

And like Prince of Egypt, this film was brought to the screen by Steven Spielberg's company.

Aaron and the Book of Wonders was originally released on video a year or two ago. It is an animated adaptation of an Isaac Bashevis Singer story that follows Aaron and his pet goat, Zlateh, as they arrive in the village of Chelm.

Aaron is forced to battle a sorcerer who wishes to bring a Golem to life. If he succeeds, the sorcerer would then be able to destroy the village and all its inhabitants.

This is a delightful little video that has not received very much publicity and is not that well known.

Another delight is the Israeli animated short Lights: A Hanukah Fable, that can be purchased at most Judaica stores. It tells the Chanukah story in a very interesting and charming way that is perfect for children of all ages.

And, if you really want to entertain the children, a copy of the Chanukah edition of Shalom Sesame would be perfect.

This is the Israeli version of Sesame Street and is very entertaining and educational. This too can probably be found at many Judaica stores.

A sensitive book on the Dionnes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Mention the Dionne quintuplets today, six decades after the height of their fame, and the name is still instantly recognizable.

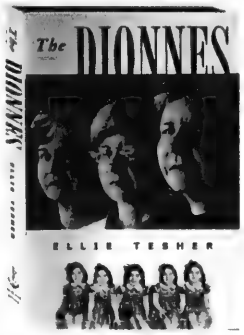
But the wary faces of the three surviving quints – as they appear on the cover of Ellie Tesher's new book, The Dionnes – reflect the difficult road they've travelled since their childhood as Canada's most famous, and arguably most adorable, youngsters.

Last year, Cecile, Annette and Yvonne Dionne – along with the daughters of their late sister Marie (Emilie died childless) – received $4 million tax-free from the Ontario government. The money was compensation for the unnatural circumstances of their childhood, and ensuing repercussions. A further $3.5 million was given this year to Kids Help Phone in their name.

The five sisters were taken from their Northern Ontario family as infants by the provincial government, which used them as a tourist attraction for nine years. The profits enriched government coffers, but the children were deprived of a normal family life and never benefited from the money themselves.

Tesher's book is sensitively written and abundantly detailed, and was written with the co-operation of the surviving sisters, now 65 years old.

On her own initiative, Tesher is sharing her royalties with them.



(She made the offer before the government settlement, and the Dionne sisters are donating their share to Kids Help Phone.)

A Toronto Star columnist who first wrote about the Dionnes in 1984, Tesher found their story – and to a greater extent, the women themselves – most compelling.

"They're very gentle women, very humble, gracious – at whatever level they [could] be, given that they were so broke," she said in a recent interview.

"They do appreciate that people cared about them, and that they [the Dionnes] brought them some happiness during difficult times [the Depression years]...They've emerged with this gentleness and dignity intact."

The word "victim" is avoided by Tesher, out of respect for her subjects. "They tried to live their lives without being victims. They never went on welfare. They never came forward until [their situation] was desperate."

Tesher, who was born and raised in Toronto, has made a name for herself tackling issues of social injustice.

A former caseworker for the Children's Aid Society, she got her start in journalism in the 1970s after a few years at home with her now-grown children, Stephen and Lisi.

After participating in a United Israel Appeal women's mission to Israel in the early 1970s, Tesher called Ralph Hyman, then editor of The Canadian Jewish News, to lambaste him about Jewish community issues she felt needed attention.

"You seem pretty articulate about it," he told her. "Write about it."

That incident led to subsequent CJN assignments and a three-year freelance career, during which she wrote for publications including Toronto Life, Maclean's, the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Star.

She's been a Toronto Star staffer since 1977, as a reporter, editor and, for the past four years, columnist.

Of all her columns, none has resonated so profoundly as the one she wrote about the Dionnes' lost trust funds. In response, she received 6,000 faxes and letters, which she personally carted in boxes to Ontario Premier Mike Harris.

She found the response gratifying. "It shows you that, at heart, Ontarians, Canadians, really care about doing the right thing."

Chava Alberstein embraces her Yiddish roots

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yiddish, supposedly, is dying out. But to Chava Alberstein, one of Israel's leading folksingers, Yiddish is a vibrant, supple, living language.

Alberstein, whose remarkable career spans more than 30 years and close to 50 albums, including her latest, I'll Be Right Back, has embraced many musical influences. But ultimately, she always returns to her Yiddish roots.

It's not hard to understand her affinity for Yiddish.

Raised in an immigrant household where Yiddish was the lingua franca, she sang in Yiddish in her debut performance on stage. And the first album she ever recorded resounded with four Yiddish songs.

Alberstein's penultimate album, The Well (Xenophile Records), which she made in 1998 with the Klezmatics, an American klezmer group, was inspired by such 20th century Yiddish poets as Yitzhik Manger and Abraham Riesen.

All in all, she has released six albums in Yiddish.

"In Israel, you would be hard-pressed to find anyone today composing and singing in Yiddish," said Lorin Sklamberg, the lead singer of the Klezmatics. "Some people still see Yiddish as the language of soft Jews who can't protect themselves. But Chava understands the joy and depth of Yiddish."

Ironically, though, she usually performs Yiddish songs everywhere but in Israel. "The most difficult place for Yiddish is Israel," said Alberstein in a telephone interview from her home in Ramat Ha Sharon, a garden suburb north of Tel Aviv.

Asked why Yiddish is undervalued in Israel, Alberstein replied, "In Israel, the Jewish language is Hebrew."

Apart from Yiddish, Alberstein's eclectic repertoire consists of Hebrew, English, French and Spanish. On Wednesday, Dec. 1 at 8 p.m., she will dip into all these languages in a concert with the Klezmatics at Roy Thomson Hall. She will also appear in Hull-Ottawa, at the Canadian Museum of Civilization, on Nov. 30.

Alberstein certainly gets around, having performed in North America and South America, Europe, South Africa and Hong Kong.

"I sing in places where people don't know the difference between Yiddish and Hebrew," she said with laughter in her voice. "It's amazing."

In her travels, particularly at music festivals, Alberstein never ceases to be astounded by the draw of Hebrew and Yiddish.

Chava Alberstein

"People are curious. They take risks. It's an experience for me and an adventure for them. The world today is a little more open."

Now 50, Alberstein was born in Szczecin, Poland. Her parents, Moshe and Ruth, lived in Warsaw when Poland was invaded by Germany in 1939.

A year later, sensing a disaster in the making, they fled to the Soviet Union, sitting out the Holocaust in Siberia, where Alberstein's brother, Alexander, was born. He is a musician and a tour guide.

The family immigrated to Israel in 1951, residing in a town near Haifa called Kiryat Chaim. At home, Alberstein spoke Yiddish and Polish. She still speaks, reads and writes Yiddish, but sometimes trips over a word.

At first, her father, a musician, was a street photographer. "Then he decided to go back to music and discovered the accordion, the poor man's piano. I was his first student, a living commercial.

"He became a very popular teacher. I've met people in different places who studied with him. It's very touching."

When she was about 11 years old, Alberstein's father presented her with a guitar he had bought from a sailor in Haifa. He taught her how to play the instrument, and she has never looked back.

At 17, she was invited by talk show host and writer Dan Ben Amotz to perform at the Hamam Theatre in Jaffa. That led to a gig on Israel Radio and yet more recognition.

When she was drafted into the army, she joined one of its entertainment troupes. She performed for soldiers all over Israel and on Israel's only television station.

In 1986, she began writing her own music and lyrics.

She met the Klezmatics, who have helped revive the klezmer sound, at the 1992 Berlin Jewish Culture Festival.

In 1995, she and her husband, the film director Nadav Levitan, with whom she has had two children, aged 23 and 27, made an award-winning documentary on Israeli Yiddish poets entitled Too Early To Be Quiet, Too Late To Sing.

The movie, in Hebrew and Yiddish, with English subtitles, has been screened in Israel and the United States but not as yet in Canada.

As for the future, Alberstein has begun planning another album of songs in Yiddish and Hebrew. And in 2000, she and the Klezmatics have lined up a Yiddish tour of Israel. "It's time," said Alberstein, preparing her fans for a nostalgic foray into mameloshen.

Animated kids' film was 'a labour of love' to make

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It took six years, but Lisa Olfman and Joy Rosen have finally brought an animated version of Something from Nothing to the small screen.

The half-hour show, which features the voices of Al Waxman and Harvey Atkin, was "definitely a labour of love," Olfman said recently.

She and Rosen optioned the rights to Phoebe Gilman's book, Something from Nothing, in 1993.

"We loved the book," recalled Rosen, sitting with Olfman in the Toronto office of Portfolio Entertainment Inc., the production and distribution company the two friends and former Montrealers founded in 1991.

More importantly, their children loved the book. Olfman has a 13-year-old and a five-year-old; Rosen's children are 11, nine and three.

"They're usually right, even when we don't want to hear it," Rosen said.

Portfolio is best known for its children's television series, Groundling Marsh, which is now seen in 95 countries. Projects in the works include two animated series and a television movie.

Something from Nothing, for those unfamiliar with the best-selling book, revolves around an Old-World Jewish family and the blanket a grandfather (Waxman) makes for his grandson, Joseph, as a baby gift.

As Joseph gets bigger, the beloved blanket also ages, apparently outliving its usefulness. But time after time, Joseph's grandfather, a tailor, transforms the gift into a different, useful item.

The original story has been fleshed out with a subplot involving Joseph's counterpart, a mouse named Mazel, who lives with his family under the floorboards.

The mice appear in the book's illustrations as a parallel to the human story.

There is also a klezmer-inspired score composed by Marvin Dolgay and Glenn Morley of Tambre Productions, and a bouncy song with similar klezmer echoes, by Jewish songwriter Phil Balsam.

Part of Dolgay's inspiration was his memory of his own grandfather, who used to hum around the kitchen. "Whenever I heard him singing, I knew I was okay," said Dolgay.

Gilman – whose writing style, say Olfman and Rosen, has a poetic cadence and special warmth – co-wrote the show with Avrum Jacobson and Christel Kleitsch.

Voices by Al Waxman and Harvey Atkin

Something from Nothing, geared for children and their families, will air Dec. 3 at 7:30 p.m. on TELETOON, The Animation Station, to coincide with the beginning of Chanukah. It will also run on Dec. 5. A French version will be shown on the station's French language affiliates. In the United States, the show will be seen Dec. 5 on PAXNet.

In addition, a home video has been produced, and a Web site, www.somethingfromnothing.com, geared to educators and school-age children, was scheduled to be up and running Nov. 22. The site will provide an opportunity to learn in a fun way about holidays celebrated in Canada.

Although the Jewish aspect of the story appealed to Rosen and Olfman, they also felt there was a universal appeal.

"It was such an optimistic way of telling the story of a very poor family, and that riches aren't just about [materialism]," said Olfman.

Both women are the granddaughters of Russian Jewish immigrants and had special relationships with their own grandfathers.

The project, said Olfman, provided a "way of connecting with that culture and that time."

But they believe today's children, whose grandparents lead a more modern lifestyle, will also connect with the story. "Even though the trappings are different, I think the emotional relationship is the same," said Olfman.

"I hope we'll always be able to produce properties that really reflect our passion, as corny as that sounds."

New collection shows Jewish storytelling is alive and well

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Some years ago, Leslie Robbins of Toronto lost her diamond wedding ring, which she had placed in a secret hiding place within her home.

For two years the ring did not turn up. After thoroughly searching her home, Robbins filed an insurance claim and began to plan a European vacation with the insurance money that she would soon be getting. Then came a phone call from a man from Temple Sinai Congregation of Toronto, who told her, "We have something here that may be of interest to you."

Unable to imagine what it might be, she asked the man what it was.

"I cannot divulge that information over the telephone," he said, "but let's just say that it's a matter of considerable worth."

The strange and circuitous route by which Robbins' diamond wedding ring left her possession, travelled from hand to hand over a distance of more than 100 kilometres, and finally made its way back into her possession is the subject of Robbins' contribution to the recent book, Chosen Tales: Stories Told by Jewish Storytellers, edited by Peninnah Schram (Jason Aronson, US$35).

Robbins, a master storyteller who founded Jewish Storytelling Arts (Ontario), is at the top of her form with her funny true story, How I Lost My Diamond Ring, which appears as one of nearly 70 stories in this rousing collection.

This collection shows that the art of Jewish storytelling is alive and well. The stories range from poignant reminiscences about grandparents, freshly-minted and twice-told chassidic tales, fairy tales about Jewish kings and princesses in imaginary kingdoms, and spiritual parables in which the Torah reigns triumphant. Their common denominator is that all originated in an oral form and only later were fixed into writing.

Some entries, like Shlomo Carlebach's The Ghetto Rebbe and His Kingdom of Children, Doug Lipman's How I Learned to Study Torah, and Yitzhak Buxbaum's Telling Jokes for the Sake of God, reflect the great chassidic storytelling tradition. Other stories, meanwhile, embrace more traditional fairy-tale elements.

The Bookseller from Gehenna, by Lennie Major, is fairy-tale in a shtetl setting. In a remote Jewish village, an old bookseller appears and reads from a magical book that allows each listener to hear something different. "For some, the book spoke of the nearness of the Messiah, while others had visions of the Garden of Eden. Some found themselves inside the Holy Temple with King Solomon, others in great yeshivot of learning."

The simple villagers eventually put the book in place of the Torah. But when they touch the yod, the pointer, to its pages, the book begins to burn with a smell of sulphur and pitch. Thereafter, the "demon book" is dispelled from their midst and the villagers, suitably chastised, return to the Torah of their ancestors.

Another tale, Robert E. Rubinstein's The Day the Rabbi Stopped the Sun, tells how time stood still while a rabbi performed an important mitzvah in New York before the onset of Shabbat. Other tales are more steeped in the secular world. Hanna Bandes' The Car that Ran from Mitzvahs is a contemporary homiletic story about how the author's repeatedly malfunctioning car brought home an important spiritual truth to her.

Appropriately enough, the collection includes a piece about the great Yiddish storyteller Isaac Bashevis Singer. Excuse Me, I Heve An Appointment With the Prime Minister, which tells of Singer's meeting with Menachem Begin, is contributed by Dvorah Menashe Telushkin, author of the Singer biography Master of Dreams.

Whatever style these stories take, each seems to satisfy in its own way. I've read only about a third of them so far, and haven't been disappointed.

Eye on Arts

BEST-SELLING AUTHOR TO READ AT CHAPTERS

At the request of the Toronto branch of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, New Leadership Division, acclaimed short-story writer Nathan Englander is scheduled to attend a meet-the-author night at Chapters Bookstore, 110 Bloor St. W., Nov. 30, 8 p.m.

Englander's collection of short stories, For the Relief of Unbearable Urges, has met with an enthusiastic response since its first publication last April. To date the book is in its 10th printing with 70,000 copies sold in North America, a situation its publisher, Random House says is almost unheard of for a book of short stories by a first-time writer.

The 29-year-old American native, who grew up in a traditional Orthodox environment in the New York area, decided against becoming a stockbroker or a photographer in favour of writing fiction. He says he's been overwhelmed by the response to his book.

"I'm thankful there's a readership – it's beyond my wildest dreams."

Admission is free.

Capsule Book Review: David Layton, son of Montreal poet Irving Layton and Aviva, makes an inauspicious literary debut with Motion Sickness, a sensational, tell-all memoir of childhood neglect, unhappiness and dysfunctionalism.

Layton, a child of privilege, describes being dragged from place to place, Greece to Morocco to London, and enduring long stretches of abandonment and loneliness while his parents irresponsibly seek adventures elsewhere. Although he readily trashes both his mother and his father, who is an icon of Canadian literature, he insists that such atrocious literary etiquette is permissible within his family.

Anecdotal in style, Layton's confessional is well-written, albeit jarring and ill-mannered, and consequently has been rewarded with an excess of media attention.

There's neither grace nor forgiveness in Layton's tone, however, nor anything particularly redeeming about this low form of literature. One wonders why he couldn't have aspired to a more honourable means of making a livelihood, perhaps in the manner of the comparatively model Richler children. (Mcfarlane, Walter & Ross, $29.95)

Jonathan Sagall in Urban Feel.

There's an Urban Feel to the latest Sagall film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jonathan Sagall, in Urban Feel, brings a hard-boiled, unblinkingly unromantic outlook to his Hebrew-language film.

Urban Feel, scheduled to open at the Cineplex Odeon chain on Nov. 26, is set in modern Israel and turns on a bisexual, nihilistic drifter who intrudes upon an unhappily married couple.

Back from India after a long absence, Emanuel (Sagall) knocks on his old girlfriend's door, and connives his way into her home while her husband is at work.

Emanuel, who until recently has subsisted on meditation and herbal tea, is in dire need of human warmth. He conveniently finds it in Eva (Dafna Rechter), the mother of an eight-year-old son. Eva tolerates Emanuel's jarring presence, but Robby (Scharonn Alexander), Eva's spouse, is none too pleased.

Upset by this new domestic arrangement, Robby leaves home, allowing Emanuel and Eva to reignite old passions and undermine what is still left of their shaky marriage.

Robby, however, is hardly a puritan or the upholder of old-fashioned family values. He is an avid reader and consumer of lonely heart ads.

Competently directed by Sagall, Urban Feel's greatest strength is its ability to convey the alienation, rootlessness and duality of its central characters.

Emanuel is clearly a cad, but as his budding friendship with Eva's son illustrates, he possesses some redeeming qualities.

While Eva succumbs to Emanuel's dubious charms, she realizes that she cannot truly liberate herself unless she dumps him and Robby.

As for Robby, he appreciates the practical virtues of a marriage, but eventually reaches the conclusion that he may be better off without Eva.

The film, suffused by a world-weary tone that is in sync with its deadpan mood, unfolds in an unidentified city, presumably Tel Aviv, but the locale in this case is really immaterial.

There is nothing strictly Israeli about these generic characters, who, on the whole, are uniformly gloomy.

There is nudity, as well as one explicit and perhaps gratuitous sexual situation. These scenes may jar some viewers. But in fairness to Sagall, all but one blend in seamlessly with the general tone of Urban Feel.

Israel falls out of soccer tournament

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Israel's run at qualifying for Euro 2000, a major European soccer tournament to be held in Holland and Belgium, came to a very disappointing end last week.

Israel met Denmark in a two-match home and away playoff series. Although Denmark was always thought to be a stronger team, Israelis were optimistic about achieving a good result in the first leg in Ramat Gan on Nov. 15.

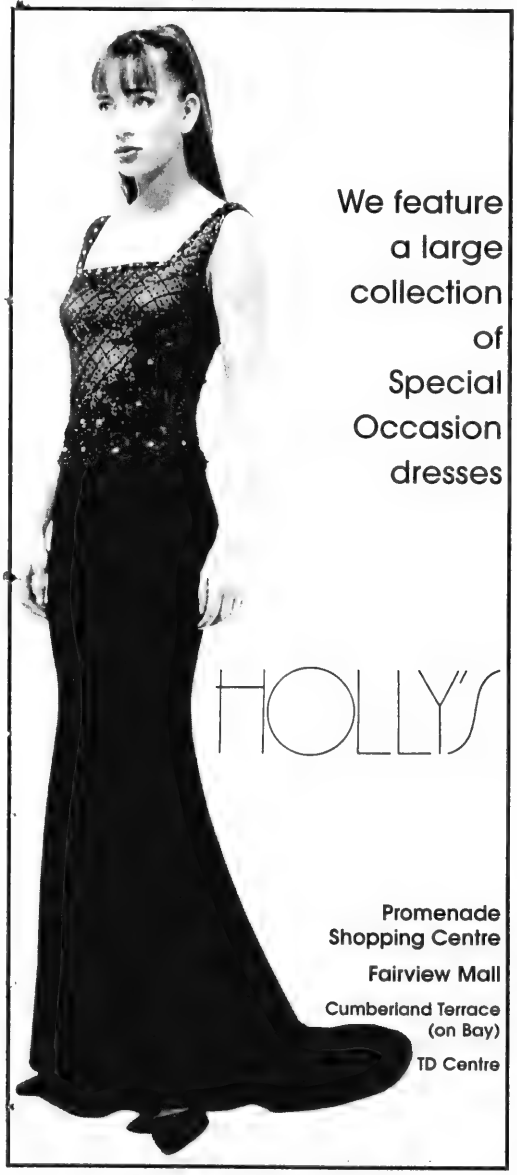
That optimistic bubble was shattered just 100 seconds into the game when a statuesque Israeli defence watched Denmark's Jon Dahl Tomasson pop the ball behind goalie Dudu Awat.

It was all downhill after that. Israel failed to recover and having midfielder Haim Revivo sent off early in the second half didn't help. In the end, Israel was humiliated in a 5-0 defeat before 45,000 disappointed fans.

No one believed Israel would be able to overcome that loss in the return match in Copenhagen Nov. 17. Although the players talked about restoring honor and pride, the Danes put an end to that quickly. Once again an early goal shattered Israel's confidence, and a relaxed Danish side cruised to a 3-0 win.

Israeli media were quick to call for national team coach's Shlomo Scharf's head following the disaster. And although Scharf, head coach for eight years, blamed the results on poor performance by his top players, there is little doubt he will be replaced.

After some positive results in the early qualifying round, last week's losses have set Israel's soccer program several years back.



Montrealer's a Scrabble champ

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Joel Wapnick sounded tired.

In fact, Wapnick was tired. Only a couple of days after coming home from Melbourne, Australia, $22,000 richer as the official world champion in Scrabble, the 53-year-old Montrealer was jet-lagged and tiled-out, he said.

His telephone interview with The Canadian Jewish News was one of many he said he had granted with media from around the world since he won in the finals against Mark Nyman of Great Britain. He was even featured on CBC's The National.

"I think I had better tiles and was fortunate enough to eke out a victory," Wapnick said modestly.

He won his final game with a score of 403-402, winning 3-1 in a best-of-five-games series.

But this was not recreational Scrabble the way it's played at home, over cookies and milk and with the television blaring in the background.

This was gladiator Scrabble. Wapnick and the other 97 competitors in the tournament had 25 minutes – much like in a clock-timed chess match – to compose all the words for their games.

If you went beyond that time limit, Wapnick said, you lost 10 points per minute.

As well, the challenge rule was modified. If you challenged a word and it did exist, you were not penalized.

Wapnick's advantage over many of us is that he has a list of some 16,000 words – most of them seven or eight letters long – coursing through his head, and a memory that could challenge the Pentium III processor.

That total may be only a fraction of the 100,000 that comprise the Official Scrabble Player's Dictionary, but they're not necessarily the type of words you use every day.

Former CFLer, George Klein, dies at 67

MONTREAL — Like his childhood hero, baseball great Lou Gehrig, George Klein considered himself the luckiest man on earth.

That positive outlook stayed with Klein right through to the last days of a long and cruel illness.

Klein, a former Canadian Football League (CFL) player and beloved volunteer at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, died recently. He was 67.

"If ever there was a person who met George and who did not respect and admire him, I never met him. If ever there was a person who became his friend who did not respect and love him, I never met him. George never had an enemy," said Dan Lazare, a friend since they were boys.

Klein was a superb athlete, excelling in a variety of sports, and was one of the greatest all-round athletes ever at McGill University, which he attended from 1949-53. He played on the varsity football and basketball teams, and won medals at track events, including the 100- and 200-yard dashes.

"To see him run in his prime was to see beauty and perfection," Lazare said.

True to character, Klein was awarded the McGill football trophy bestowed on the player who best combines ability and sportsmanship.

Klein had been a counsellor for years at Camp Hiawatha, where he specialized in canoeing and tripping, and is remembered as a role model by ex-campers.

After graduating in commerce from McGill, Klein was drafted by the CFL's Ottawa Roughriders, and later played for the Montreal Alouettes and the B.C. Lions.

After his career in the CFL, he returned to Montreal to work in the family clothing business, Kay Mar Ltd. and Hallmark Ltd., with which he remained to the end of his life.

"In the business world, George applied the same drive and self-discipline that he had displayed in sports, and the same desire to do the best he could," Lazare said.

"As always, he acted with integrity and fairness to all, those who worked for him and those with whom he did business. He was in the full sense of the word a mentsh."

Klein also became an accomplished after-dinner speaker, known for his gentle, wry sense of humor.

Klein was parnass for the morning service at the Shaar Hashomayim for many years. He also helped found the Third Service at the High Holy Days, which was created to enable any Jew who might otherwise not go to a regular synagogue service to attend without charge. He has acted as parnass for the Third Service for the past 18 years.

"He welcomed each and every congregant as they came into the service," said Beverly Spanier, another organizer of the Third Service. "He would lovingly place a tallit on the shoulders of a [disabled] man from the Miriam Home so that he could participate in the Torah ceremony.

"It was George who fought tirelessly to ensure that the service would continue and would not charge any fee. George always wanted a participatory service in which both men and women could take part."

Klein, Spanier said, was a man for whom "doing good deeds was an integral part of life."

"Like Gehrig, George never complained, ever – to his last day. To every person visiting him in the hospital he displayed a keen interest as to how they were getting on," Lazare said.

"He said his playing field was now the hospital, and that he was measuring his progress in small victories, like moving his right arm, which had become immobile. As always, he spoke with humor, right up to the last moment. If courage is grace under pressure, he was surely courageous."

Klein is survived by his wife Barbara, daughters Gila and Alicia, brothers Mitchell and Leonard, sister Susan, and many friends.

Do you know the Latke man?

By JORDAN MAX

Ah, Chanukah is almost here. I can almost smell the fried onions now. Around the Max household, I make the latkes, and latke making is serious business.

Last Laugh

First of all, it's what we call a patchkedik activity ("labour intensive" just doesn't quite capture the essence of patchke). As well, it's the only time of the year at which we haul out the food processor monster.

Now for the diehard traditionalists, nothing beats the act of hand grating a whole 10-pound bag of potatoes. You literally put yourself into your food – that is, if you include bits of skin (and hopefully no blood).

However, this is the one time of the year where the cost-benefit analysis tells you to use the food processor. In other words, for the amount of work involved, it's worth washing its 3,000 pieces.

Yes, I am a Jewish male who actually knows his way around the kitchen. (Note for less informed males: the kitchen is the place where food is prepared before it appears on your dinner plate.) In fact, I even know how to operate (and clean!) the food processor. After all, it's electric and basically a very small table saw for food.

If you're the type who thinks that latkes come from a mix in a Manischewitz box, allow me to take you through it step by step. First, you peel and finely grate potatoes and onions. Then you drain, and then you drain again. Then you add the eggs and leftover matzah meal or flour, salt and pepper. Then you put it back in the processor to mix it all up.

There are a million variations on the recipe, but my most memorable one was the time I made blue latkes. For those of you who recall Grade 9 chemistry, starches, such as potatoes, when left to oxidize (eg. not soaked in water) will turn blue. So in this case, being a latke novice at the time, I didn't soak, and voilà, blue latkes.

Actually, they weren't really pure blue – more like a nauseating shade of blue-green. Strange, but no amount of prodding on my part could persuade any member of my family to try any. I tried to remind them that some corn chips are blue (made from blue corn), but to no avail. I ate a lot of blue latkes that year. I vaguely remember being sick as a dog. But I digress.

Next, after draining, it's on to the frying. For this I also haul out the monster electric frypan, which again is only put to its full use at Chanukah. This monster is also highly cost-efficient. I can do nine latkes at once, thereby dramatically speeding up the process of making countless dozens of latkes.

There's also something magical about quantities of latkes; just like lox, no matter how many you make, they all get eaten, in five minutes or less. Quantum physicists take note: There is probably a PhD thesis waiting for you to explain the volume-intake paradox. It leaves other mathematical paradoxes (paradoxi?) in the dust. Two hours to make 300 latkes, eaten in less than five minutes. As the latke chef, all you can do is sit there and silently cry.

Of course, when it comes to latkes, everyone's a maven, and is more than willing to share their culinary opinion. They're either too salty, not salty enough, too hard, too soft, too greasy, too wet, too dry, too much egg, not enough egg, too much onion, not enough onion, too thin, too thick, too stiff, too limp, too large, too small, not hot enough, too hot, or my personal favourite, "they just don't taste right."

After two hours of constant frying, frankly, I don't care – just stop kvetching and eat them.

So, to all my readers, a freilich Chanukah. Eat, drink, sing and gamble while you watch your "dripless" candles melt all over your nice artistic chanukiah. May all your potatoes be cold, your frying pan hot, and your blood cholesterol be slightly elevated for only eight days.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

It is hard being the youngest kid in the family. I rarely get new clothes and I am always compared to my sisters. When we have a family party, I hear things like: "You're just as pretty as your sisters," or "Don't worry dear. That's just baby fat. You'll grow up just as beautiful and slim as your sisters."

The part I find the hardest, though, is school. My sisters are both very bright and I have some of the same teachers as they had. I always feel I have to live up to the expectations the teachers have of me because of the high grades my sisters had. How can I break through this habit people seem to have and make my own mark?

The Little Sister

Dear Little Sister,

It is sometimes very hard to live up to your own expectations, let alone the expectations of others. Although it may seem impossible, you should set your own goals and not attempt to follow in your sisters' footsteps if you want to accomplish other things. If you follow your own dreams and know what makes you happy, people will begin to realize that you are a unique individual, who is different from your sisters.

However, there is a positive aspect to having older sisters who set certain expectations for you. In most cases, as you have stated, teachers associate you with the high academic achievements of your sisters. That will put you in good stead with the teacher. Their expectations will point you in the right direction to work hard, and help you achieve your goals. While already on the right path, you have the opportunity to prove your own merits. In this way you can use your sisters' reputation for your benefit.

On a similar note, I am sure that if you speak to your parents about how you feel, they will be supportive. Don't be shy if you want some new clothes. Ask your parents if you can get an allowance so that you can save and not be forced to wear your sisters' old attire.

It is important to remember that you are your own unique and special person. Despite the expectations you feel at school or at home among family, in truth you only have to satisfy yourself. That is the only true expectation that you should live up to.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto.

A home where light is cherished

Editorial

In our hemisphere, Chanukah falls during the time of year when light is most precious. For eight days prior to the winter solstice, we add to the pale, diminished light of the day with a display of candles in symmetric formation. The light is not for our personal use, however. Its glow is entirely symbolic.

Primarily, it proclaims the miracle that God wrought for our people so long ago at this time of year. It is a miracle whose message the lights bring to the passersby who see the candles at a distance from the street, and also, perhaps more importantly, to our children who see the candles up close from within our embrace.

Seeing the candles glow, and hearing each day for eight days the story of that miracle retold, our children absorb deep in their souls the nurturing truth that theirs is a home where light and some of its invisible but vital components – freedom, responsibility, goodness and respect – are cherished.

Is there any truth more precious that our children could absorb?

We thank God for granting us life, for sustaining us and for bringing us to this day.

Happy Chanukah.

Canadian appointed to Vatican panel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Michael Marrus, a University of Toronto scholar and administrator, has been appointed to a historians' panel charged with reviewing published Vatican archival material relating to World War II.

The announcement comes on the heels of two events – the release, in 1998, of We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah, in which the Vatican apologized for the failure of Catholics to save Jews during the Holocaust, and the recent publication of Hitler's Pope, John Cornwell's bitterly critical biography of Pope Pius XII, whom he accuses of anti-Semitism and shameful silence during the war.

Marrus, a specialist in the Holocaust whose books include The Holocaust in History and Vichy France and the Jews, is dean of the U of T's School of Graduate Studies.

The joint team, consisting of three Jewish and three Catholic historians, was chosen by the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews and the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations (IJCIC) at a meeting in Rome on Oct. 18.

The team will study 11 volumes of Vatican archival material on the role of the Catholic church from

The News in Brief

CANADA

Murder Aftermath

TORONTO — Jews for Judaism last week, received a complaint from someone in the Bathurst-Wilson area that a Hebrew-Christian group was using the beating death of 15-year-old Matti Baranovski as an excuse to missionize to Jews. The tragic incident was used as a way to introduce door-to-door sermons on the need to accept Jesus as the Jewish messiah, the anonymous complainant charged.

Also, there was a report that someone had erected a large cross at the flower-strewn memorial to Baranovski at the park where the beating took place. A CJN reporter found a small sign explaining why a cross had been left there, but no cross. There were, however, several votive candles burning, and a small statue of Jesus at the scene. The next day, a makeshift cross bedecked with Stars of David appeared.

Turkey Relief Mission

TORONTO — Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian Relief Committee, has sent a relief mission to earthquake ravaged Turkey. The team will work closely with Israel Defence Force personnel, who have erected a field hospital near the site of the most recent tremor. Among the Ve'ahavta volunteers on the mission are Peter Silverman of City-TV, and photographer Stephen Epstein, a past president of the organization.

Prior to leaving, the mission was presented with a cheque for $25,000 from Canadian Jewish Congress. CJC began raising funds following the first earthquake earlier this year. It had already presented a cheque for $18,000 to the Turkish ambassador in Ottawa.

ISRAEL

Officer Fired

JERUSALEM — The Israeli army's chief of staff last week fired an officer for telling a group of soldiers that Judaism's Conservative and Reform movements have caused more harm to Jews than the Nazis. Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz ordered the firing of Lieut. Gamliel Peretz on the recommendation of the army's chief education officer.

Conversion Scandal

JERUSALEM — Two senior rabbinical court officials were arrested this month on suspicion of receiving bribes in exchange for issuing conversion certificates. The arrests followed allegations from four women who said they had been asked to pay sums ranging from $600 to $10,000 for the certificates.

Interfaith Conference

JERUSALEM — The Dalai Lama last week addressed an interfaith conference here aimed at making religion the source of peace in the next millennium. Rabbis, priests, Muslim clerics and Buddhist monks were among those attending the three-day conference.

WORLD

Shoah Places Third

NEW YORK — The Holocaust is the third biggest news event of the 20th century, according to a new Gallup poll published Nov. 17 in USA Today. Events relating to World War II swept the top three slots in the poll, with the war itself coming in first, and the dropping of the atomic bomb second.

Lufthansa Kicks In

BERLIN — Germany's national airline announced it will take part in a compensation fund for Holocaust-era slave workers. The Lufthansa announcement, which did not include a dollar amount, was reportedly made by representatives of the firm in Israel. The announcement came as German President Johannes Rau urged more German firms to participate in the fund.

Poll on Jews

BERLIN — Some 43 percent of Germans believe Jews have too much influence in the country, according to a new poll. Analysts of the poll, which also reported that 41 percent of the respondents believe Jews are unable to get along with other Germans, say the current stalemate over a proposed national Holocaust memorial and the size of a proposed fund for Holocaust-era slave labourers help explain the poll's findings.

Jewish Boy Released

MOSCOW — Chechen kidnappers have released a 15-year-old Jewish boy they have held captive since May. More than 1,000 people are being held hostage by Chechen gangsters looking for ransom. Jews, especially Israeli citizens, are the most desirable prey because it's widely believed that Israel and the international Jewish community will pay high ransoms for them.

Women Dance With Rescued Iraqi Torah

NEW YORK — A group of female Jewish scholars here, recently danced joyously with a 200-year-old Torah that had made a difficult journey from Iraq to the United States by way of Jordan and Israel.

"Without a doubt, I am sure that the people who started with this Torah could not imagine that its home would be a women's study group," said Nina Bruder, executive director of Drisha, a Jewish women's study program.

The Torah, whose combination of flat mulberry juice ink and raised lettering indicates that it is 200 years old, was abandoned in a Baghdad synagogue with many other Torah scrolls during the exodus of Iraqi Jews to Israel in 1948.

There the Torahs remained, collecting dust until Saddam stockpiled and hid them not long before the start of the Persian Gulf War.

But in 1991, the Torah was rescued, along with 34 others, by an Iraqi Muslim who stuffed them into the tires of Jordan-bound trucks. From there, the sacred texts were transferred into Israeli hands.

Iraqi authorities caught the man and severely beat him.

"It's a remarkable story," said Blu Greenberg, whose son helped repair one of the smuggled Torahs a year ago.

The UN ruling: Canada, Ontario and jurisdiction

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Is Canada stuck between a rock and a hard place?

It was Canada, after all, that was named in the historic Nov. 5 United Nations ruling as having violated its international obligations through the failure of Ontario to equally fund its public and private – specifically, Jewish – schools.

That's because UN decisions of this sort name countries, not provinces or regions of countries. It is countries which are members of the UN, and countries which sign UN-backed agreements on human rights.

The UN's human rights committee said Ontario discriminates by funding its Catholic education system, but not schools operating under other religions, responding to the grievance launched by Toronto Jewish parent Arieh Waldman, who complained of having to pay tuition at a Jewish day school while Catholics got a free education.

The world body gave Canada 90 days to propose a remedy. Ottawa has until Feb. 3 to prove that it is not in the same company as countries such as Somalia or Iraq.

But education is solely a provincial matter in this country. So while officials in the federal justice department study the ruling, and try to come up with something to tell the UN in two months, Ontario's government is digging in its heels.

Last week, the province's education minister sounded some of the bluntest language heard in years. UN ruling or no, Janet Ecker vowed that under no circumstances will Ontario extend funding to private and religious-based schools – "Period. End of story."

She was responding to a published report that Ontario's cabinet was considering a proposal to fund private and independent schools.

Ecker steadfastly stuck to earlier statements she had made, namely, that Ontario remains committed to a strong, public system, and had no comment on the leaked cabinet document, or on another report that said the

Charity that funds settlers fights revocation of status

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto-based foundation that has apparently raised millions of dollars for Jewish settlers in the territories is appealing the revocation of its status as a charity.

In May, Revenue Canada (now called the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, or CCRA) announced it would strip the Press Foundation of its registration as a charity that may issue receipts for tax purposes because it was raising funds for Yesha – the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

It is not illegal for Canadians to send money to Jewish settlers – only to claim it as a tax deductible charitable donation.

That's because tax law in this area is determined by Canadian foreign policy, said CCRA spokesperson Michel Cleroux in a phone interview from Ottawa.

Canadian charities that wish to keep their status, and their ability to issue receipts, may not channel money to causes that go against Canadian foreign policy, Cleroux explained.

Since the 1967 Six Day War, Canada has regarded the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, the Golan Heights and eastern Jerusalem as occupied by Israel.

Ottawa's policy has been that Jewish settlements beyond the so-called Green Line are illegal and not helpful to the peace process. Thus, aiding settlers financially runs counter to Canadian policy on charities.

However, the Press Foundation has appealed the CCRA decision to the Federal Court. Cleroux said he could not comment on the case, as it is before the courts.

But in its six-page letter explaining its decision, Revenue Canada said allowing Canadian charities "to assist in providing the religious institutions and the health, education and other social services that encourage and sustain Israeli settlement in the Occupied Territories would be fundamentally at odds with Canada's position."

The government also said the foundation exercised "a lack of proper controls" over the money it raised in Canada, and slammed "the insufficient state of its books and records."

The Press Foundation is registered to an address on Prince Charles Drive in Toronto. The CJN found that the address is the residence of Rabbi Shalom Jundef.

According to tax records, the foundation has raised as much as $5 million a year.

Revenue Canada has expressed concerns about the charity since 1991.

The government described the foundation's attempts to comply with Canadian law as "essentially a paper exercise meant to circumvent the spirit and intent of the [Income Tax] Act."

Cleroux said Revenue Canada is disputing the charity's argument that Ottawa's policy is discriminatory. He said the same rules apply in other parts of the world where sovereignty over territories is in dispute.

This isn't the first time Revenue Canada has acted in this area.

In 1996, the Toronto Zionist Council had its charitable status revoked for funnelling money to the settlements.

Rabbi Jundef did not return The CJN's calls.

Memorial service for Matti

TORONTO — There will be a combination memorial service/menorah lighting on Dec. 5 in memory of Dmitry (Matti) Baranovski, the Russian-Jewish teen beaten to death in a park earlier this month.

The large menorah normally lit in Mel Lastman Square will be moved to the park area, just off Torresdale Avenue, where the 15-year-old's murder took place.

The menorah lighting is Matti's mother's idea, Councillor Mike Feldman told The CJN.

The family, Feldman said, does not want a permanent menorah at the site because they don't consider Matti's murder a hate crime.

The family is weighing the idea of eventually erecting a permanent marker, perhaps a granite stone with a plaque, Feldman said.

Farber's rejection as expert witness met with criticism

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Bernie Farber

TORONTO — A judge's rejection of Bernie Farber as an expert witness, in a trial regarding the promotion of hatred against Roma refugees by a group of skinheads, is not justified, according to a prominent Toronto criminal lawyer.

In his three decades of practising law, Clayton Ruby hasn't heard of another case like it, he told The CJN last week.

Farber, the executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, was rejected by Provincial Court Judge Russell Otter on the basis of strongly worded statements he (Farber) made to the media after a group of skinheads, some carrying swastika flags, picketed the Scarborough's Lido Motel in August 1997.

Among Farber's comments was a quote in Now Magazine: "Slam [the skinheads] hard and slam them now."

The judge expressed concerns about possible bias on the part of Farber, who has testified as an expert witness in 11 previous cases.

Expert witnesses "always come into a case with a point of view. If they don't have a point of view, they're not useful," said Ruby, who is not affiliated with CJC and is not involved in the trial in question.

What makes this case different, said Ruby, is its profile in the media.

"Most expert witnesses are not dealing with anything newsworthy. In this case, the press calls the leading expert in the country. That's not surprising. He speaks freely. Why should he not? But why should the Crown be denied the evidence of the best expert?"

The ruling is "unusual," agreed Ed Morgan, professor of law at the University of Toronto and national counsel to Canadian Jewish Congress.

A CJC news release expressed disappointment "that the court won't have the benefit of this expertise but, nevertheless, we will continue to work with government, the courts and the police in continuing to confront racists and white supremacists and offer our services in that regard."

The organization's first priority, said Danny Roth, CJC Ontario region's public affairs and communications director, continues to be to serve the needs of the Jewish community.

Abuse against women described as a shandeh

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is crucial to recognize that women abuse is a problem in the Jewish community says the supervisor of the women abuse program at Jewish Family and Child Service.

"It is a real problem, and it is our problem," said Gail Gould.

She was part of a panel at a recent evening sponsored by the family and society department of Jewish Women International and the social action committee at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. Other panel members included Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah, and Jane, a survivor of women abuse. Moderator was Naomi Alboim, provincial deputy minister of citizenship, culture and recreation.

"The word shandeh is a potent word in the Yiddish language; it packs more meaning than shame or disgrace. It is a shandeh if we deny that abuse is going on, and if we don't try to prevent it," said Gould.

Palestinian women face violence
see page 14

Coming to terms with women abuse, she said, means coming to terms with some of the myths that abound in the Jewish community.

In addition to the myth that women abuse does not go on in the Jewish community, "it is a myth that men who abuse are crazy or are misfits. Many abusers are intelligent, and hold responsible positions. They are often charmers who are well respected in the community."

Another myth, she said, is that Jewish men are not aggressive enough to abuse women. "The basis of abuse is not aggression, it is control – one person repeatedly attacking or terrifying another person in an attempt to control."

A film, To Save a Life, Ending Domestic Violence in Jewish Families, screened before the speakers began, warned that myths are destructive because they prevent us from dealing with the issue. "Women typically cover up what is happening at home, and often minimize the problem. Silence will not make it go away," the narrator said.

Abuse does not have to be physical, said Rabbi Allen. "It is abusive for a husband to prevent his wife from visiting her parents, or going next door. Emotional pain is no less hurtful than physical pain."

Acts of violence, he said, are not to be tolerated. "Shalom bayit is the ideal towards which we strive, but it should not be an excuse to cover up violence. To have a faithful home, both husband and wife must be faithful to tradition, and to each other. They should be united in love, companionship and spirit. When this is torn apart, the Jewish home crumbles."

The Jewish home is precious, said Rabbi Allen, "but when people cannot live together the way they should, they should not live together at all."

Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) sees more than 400 abused women a year, said Gould, "and we believe that this is the tip of the iceberg. There is no segment immune – whether young or old, and regardless of race, status or religious belief. No one knows how widespread the problem is, because statistics are not relevant. The problem is often concealed."

Children of abused women are also victims, said Gould. "It is estimated that as many as 80 percent of children of abused women are exposed to the violence. Children who witness violence are left with legacies. Too many of these children are stunted before they have a chance to develop."

A program, children witnessing abuse, sponsored by JF&CS, is geared for children who live in a home where abuse has occurred or is occurring. The program offers individual counselling, peer mentoring and separate groups for parents.

"Children who grow up in homes where they see or hear fighting between parents may learn this strategy as a way to solve problems, deal with frustration, and get their needs met," says a JF&CS pamphlet. "In order to stop the cycle of abuse, it is crucial that children are given the opportunity to talk about the secret of abuse at home by allowing them the chance to express their feelings around what they have seen and heard."

Gould urged the mostly women audience that if they have reason to suspect abuse, "talk to your friend or sister or brother. Listen to them, believe them and affirm their experiences. Remember that they must make their own decisions about their lives. Respect that decision."

Jane, a mother of two, who left an abusive husband after six years of marriage, and who recently remarried, said that people asked her why she stayed in her abusive marriage. "The question should not be why I stayed, but rather, why did he abuse."

Before her marriage, she said, the red flags were all there. I just didn't recognize them. "There is a lot of shame in an abusive marriage, but the shame should be his. I am only ashamed that I stayed as long as I did."

Reckless words

Last week the director of the Vatican Press Office, Joaquin Navarro-Valls, released a statement harshly condemning the government of Israel for not preventing the start of construction of a mosque on a disputed site near the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth.

"I believe the political authorities in this case have a great responsibility, because instead of favouring unity, they create the foundation to foment division," Navarro-Valls said. (Our emphasis)

The words cut deeply and unfairly.

The area in question is a two-dunam lot that is claimed equally by the Muslim and the Christian communities of Nazareth. The dispute became public some two years ago. The church received clearance from the Municipality of Nazareth to clear the site for a plaza that would be used by millennium pilgrims. But local Muslims objected, saying the land in question belonged to the Wakf, the Muslim religious trust. The matter was taken to court and the Nazareth District Court essentially threw the dispute into the lap of the Israeli government by deciding that the land in dispute belonged to the state.

As a result of the court's decision, and in an effort to find common ground, as it were, to settle the dispute, the government established a ministerial committee headed by Internal Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami. In addition, local Nazareth religious leaders set up a seven-person monitoring committee on the issue.

The ministerial committee determined that the Muslim community could proceed to build a mosque on a 700-square-metre portion of the lot. The remainder would be used for the pilgrims' plaza. As well, a police post would be built nearby. The decision was accepted, even if grudgingly in some quarters, by the local communities.

Speaking on behalf of Israel, Foreign Minister David Levy, sharpy rebuked the Vatican's press release. "Our efforts were aimed at defusing the dispute and reducing the tension between the faiths," Levy said. "The act of laying the cornerstone was done by agreement...all these unfounded statements are simply the opposite of the truth."

The committee's decision may prove ultimately to have been incorrect; but one cannot challenge the painstaking, delicate procedures that led to the decision. It was a careful attempt conducted in good faith by the government of Israel to placate the competing Muslim and Christian claims.

Given this background to the dispute, the accusation by the Vatican that Israel was "creat[ing] the foundation to foment division" was both reckless and potentially dangerous.

Denominational disputes anywhere in the world are always difficult to resolve. But in the Middle East, especially now, on the verge of a significant religious date in Christian theology, when security services around the world are on heightened alert against problematic, violent, religious fundamentalists, the Vatican's statement impugning Israel's good faith efforts, is deeply troubling.

Religious leaders should be seeking ways of promoting cooperation and understanding. It is hard to see how the statement by Navarro-Walls will achieve that.

Zegota helped escape — I

I was born on March 24, 1942, in the Warsaw Ghetto. Because of the help received from Zegota via a Jewish member, Basia Berman, my mother, my sister and I were able to escape the ghetto in November 1942. Zegota's help continued while we were in hiding at the house of Polish friends Cezary and Helena Newakowski. Zegota supplied false documents as well as monetary help.

If Sholem Hershkop (CJN, Nov. 18, Letters to Editor) wants only one Jewish child who survived the war thanks to Zegota, I am the living proof. If he wants just one Jewish member of Zegota, who survived the war, I can supply two names: Basia and Adolf Berman, who left Poland immediately after the war and settled in Israel.

We hear about Holocaust deniers like Zundel all the time. Let us Jews not be narrow-minded by denying the existence of the Polish rescue organization whose actions were truly in the spirit of brotherhood among nations.

Zegota helped escape — II

I am one of the survivors, who after the escape – together with my younger, four-year-old sister – from the Warsaw Ghetto in August 1942, was helped by Zegota in arranging false, but real birth certificates, and in finding hiding places for both of us, where eventually we survived until liberation in 1945.

Prof. Wladyslaw Bartoszewski has explained that his release from Auschwitz was obtained by the International Red Cross, with which he was associated prior to the war. Hitler and the Nazis occasionally pretended to cooperate with IRC, and this was the case.

Regarding Hershkop's question about what happened to Jewish members of Zegota, I can mention one, most prominent, as Zegota chair, Dr. Leon Feiner. Feiner was an author of known reports to the west about the situation in the ghetto. He participated in the Warsaw Ghetto uprising in 1943, as well as in the Warsaw uprising in 1944. He survived the war, but died in earlier liberated Lublin in February 1945.

Questions article on Buchanan

Re: From the editor's desk (CJN, Nov. 4).

It was astonishing to find, in an article devoted to attacks on Holocaust denial, an example of Holocaust revisionism at its worst. I am referring to the attack on Pat Buchanan, who is described as "the prototype" of "mainstream politicians who hug a veneer of respectability close to their business suits, while underneath they hold tightly to the same sickening xenophobic trash that the Nazi brownshirts boldly wore in the 1930s."

If Buchanan is no better than a brownshirt, it follows that the brownshirts were no worse than Buchanan; i.e., they were a legitimate lawful democratic movement who happened to hold views opposed by the Jewish establishment, precisely the argument of the Holocaust revisionists.

Let me remind you that the brownshirts were a street gang who were attempting to overthrow the legitimate government by force, while intimidating their opponents through violence. Has anyone even suggested that this would describe Buchanan?

It is indeed important to fight the Holocaust deniers with the truth. But nothing whatsoever is gained by gross, baseless exaggeration.

Jews need help too

For the last two years, Holocaust Education Week has presented a program called, Not In Our Town. It is a film about the efforts of Billings, Mont. residents to rally behind each other and combat hate crimes. They put paper menorahs in their windows to show solidarity with the Jewish community after a racist attack on a Jewish home. They also helped remove racist graffiti from a woman's house.

After reading the article "Native Canadians help restore Jewish Cemetery" (CJN, Nov. 18), I realized that we had experienced our own Not In Our Town. I am constantly reading in the CJN about how Israel and Jewish people in general are always ready and willing to help in any global disaster, be it the Turkish, Greek or Taiwan earthquakes or right in our own backyard during the floods in Quebec. We help the homeless, support many charities, and the list goes on and on. It was heartening that someone came out to help us, it's about time.

Misprint apology accepted

Re: "No Polish Labour Camps" (CJN, Nov. 25 Letters to the Editor).

I must admit to some surprise and disappointment in a letter signed by Hanna Sokolski of the Canadian-Polish Congress, Toronto District, vehemently criticizing the planners of the annual Holocaust Education Week for what was, clearly, a misprint on one page of their Holocaust Education Week brochure. The mistake in question, done without malice, wrongly referred to Nazi labour camps as "Polish labor camps."

In a more reasonable manner, Ala Gettlich of the National Canadian-Polish Congress brought this to our attention. In consultation with the UJA Federation's Holocaust Education department, we acknowledged her letter and apologized for the printing error. Gettlich, to her credit, accepted this apology and went on to positively comment on the good work of UJA Federation in presenting Holocaust Education Week.

Fight against Russian anti-Semitism gets privatized

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A new Jewish umbrella organization with the goal of combating the spread of anti-Semitism has been founded in Moscow.

Some 200 delegates, representing more than 80 communities in Russia, have established the Federation of Jewish Communities. Rabbi Berl Lasar was chosen to serve as its chair.

Historically, the existence of anti-Semitism in Russia has been long-standing, and its roots can be traced back to many causes. The current upsurge of anti-Semitism can be attributed to three developments: a highly charged atmosphere preceding general elections next month; a rise of hatred and xenophobia in Russia fostered by terrorist attacks there, and the aggravation of hostility with Muslims in the Caucasus region and Central Asia.

Anti-Semites gather at a rally in Moscow.

There is speculation that these developments have spurred an increase in the number of Russian immigrants who left for Israel this year.

Leaders of the newly founded organization estimate that in addition to the 1.5 to two million residents in the former Soviet Union (FSU) today who have been counted as Jews, there are many others who concealed their identities in the past, and who might be willing to be identified as Jews.

The new umbrella foundation pursues dual goals – representing various member Jewish organizations in their contacts with government authorities, and responding to anti-Semitism. It intends to set-up a fund to finance legal battles, as well as public relations campaigns to fight anti-Semitism.

Micha Naftalin, the director-general of the American Union of Councils for Soviet Jewry, which in the past worked on behalf of immigration to Israel, and today focuses on fighting anti-Semitism, said, "Anti-Semitism in the [FSU] differs from what occurred during the days of Soviet rule."

Meeting last month with the forum of Jewish members of the U.S. Congress, Naftalin said "it would be a mistake to imagine that since Jews today enjoy more religious freedom, this means that they also have more security than they did during Soviet times.

"Under Soviet rule, the regime did not allow terror acts, apart from cases where such acts were sponsored by the KGB, or by the Communist Party."

Commenting on the implications of Yeltsin's faltering grasp of the reins of power in his country, Naftalin said: "The Duma's refusal to denounce pogrom threats leveled by one of its representatives, General Albert Mashakov and the anti-Semitic platform sponsored by the Communist Party amounted to a green light being given to the outbreak of anti-Semitism in the spring this year.

"Such 'privatization' of terror acts generally did not transpire during the days of Soviet rule; and so, whether or not it is motivated to take action, the police lack experience in dealing with such acts of hatred."

He called Russia "fertile ground" which has been cultivated for the "planting of bombs, for kidnapping and murder, for the desecration of synagogues and cemeteries, and for abusively anti-Semitic proclamations."

Referring to the upcoming parliamentary elections, Naftalin said it is "frightening" that 13 of 34 parties with candidates in the Duma race are fascist or Communist.

"In Chechnya and Dagestan, war and Islamic fundamentalism have joined old, Soviet-style anti-Semitism," and this combination has posed serious danger to Jews in the region, he said, noting that some Jews have been told they have to choose between conversion to Islam or death.

Dagestan's Jewish community – today it numbers about 5,000 people – is one of the oldest in the FSU. The precise number of Jews in Chechnya is not known. Spokespersons for rebels in both regions have declared repeatedly that their homelands have been "victimized by an international conspiracy in which Zionism and Israel play central roles."

Gradually, the FSU has been relegating responsibility for dealing with social issues, including the rise of fascism and anti-Semitism, to local authorities. Meantime, Moscow's anti-Semitic organizations have gone global, cultivating international ties.

Unrest remains in Russia.

Last month, Mashakov met in Moscow with the Ku Klux Klan's David Duke, to discuss "the new world order being orchestrated by the Jews," as an announcement they released put it.

A report submitted by the Federation of Jewish Communities to the U.S. Congress attests to an improvement in the Jewish situation in some regions of the FSU, despite anti-Semitic incidents. The report states that "in the Ukraine, central authorities took substantive steps to defend Jewish citizens against incitement, violence and anti-Semitism."

In another report, the federation stated that in Georgia, Azerbaijan and Armenia, the level of anti-Semitism is lower than in several other lands of the FSU.

The federation reports that relations with Israel have had a positive impact on relations with local Jewish communities. This holds true, for instance, in the case of relations between Israel and Azerbaijan.

In contrast, "some anti-Semitic emotions have been stirred in Armenia, as a consequence of the alliance between Israel, Azerbaijan and Turkey, and also as a result of the feeling that [interest in] the Holocaust deflected world attention away from the mass murder of Armenians in Turkey in 1915."

> Positive relations with Israel have helped Jews

The number of new immigrants reaching Israel from the FSU has grown in recent months; and it's certain that the rise in anti-Semitism, coupled with the downward plunge of Russia's economy, played a part in this trend.

Last month, more than 7,500 immigrants arrived in Israel, the largest number registered for a one-month period during the past eight years.

In the long term, however, another trend could be no less significant: the number of olim from the FSU exploring the possibility of resettling in Russia permanently and in the end, opting to return to Israel.

It turns out that all of Israel's woes pale in comparison to the lack of any prospect of succeeding in the FSU.

How important is Israel to you?

Back in the 1960s – especially around the time of the Six Day War – Israel held the first, second and third spots in the consciousness of most Diaspora Jews.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

What happened there happened to us, we felt. The concept of "one people" was not just theory, it was reality, and the Jewish state stood at its centre.

But recently, disturbing statistics have appeared in the United States. According to the Washington Jewish Week, "over a quarter of respondents felt fairly distant (21 percent) or very distant (five percent) when asked how close they felt to Israel." The survey raised hardly any eyebrows, while 30 years ago this would not have been believed possible.

Mind you, this is an American Jewish Committee survey and it does not, in my opinion, apply in equal measure to Canada. Here, the Jewish community has always been more Zionist. However, I guess that even here, there is less of a sense of identity with Israel than that which existed three decades ago.

Some people say that this has to do with the fact that in those days, Israel was like a bride. She was flawless and altogether beautiful. Criticism of her was either unheard of or not even tolerated in the community. But today, with the relationship that much older, we know that the earlier image does not conform with reality. Some analysts, carrying on the marriage metaphor, say that this happens to relationships of people in wedlock: at first there are no errors or criticisms, but as the years go by, the relationship matures and takes into consideration the faults of the partners. It does not mean that divorce looms, but there is a change.

There are some analysts who point to the fact that the slack in identification with Israel has been taken up by raising the memory of the Holocaust to a place of central importance. Jews, they say, feel most secure when they can maintain cohesion by considering themselves as perpetual victims. They have a problem adjusting to a world where anti-Semitism has decreased to a point where it hardly matters anymore.

What is lacking in this equation is, of course, a greatly diminished religious identification found in many of our younger people. I for one am not greatly worried about the changing importance that they assign to Israel on the one hand and the Holocaust on the other. We will adjust to both. I am concerned that without a stronger religious identification, our baby boomers will find it increasingly more difficult to keep their children Jewish.

If you have teenagers who are wondering where Israel fits into their sense of identity, I suggest you pay attention to some splendid youth travel programs to Israel which the Bronfman family foundation helps fund. These trips give young people a chance to spend time in Israel and to explore it together with other students.

Spaced out in Israel

Things are starting to feel a bit cramped here lately. No, make that quite cramped – and getting more so every day. Everywhere you live, of course, is a trade-off. Certainly choosing Israel over Canada pays countless dividends, along with the inevitable drawbacks.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

One of the biggest challenges in living in Israel is adjusting to a very different notion of space. In North America, it's easy to take the relatively spacious conditions for granted. Growing up in Toronto, I always felt vaguely reassured by the sense of unlimited open space that lay beyond the northern limits of the city. It didn't matter how often I actually came into contact with the boundless nature on the horizon. More important was the knowledge that an infinity of wilderness was out there to keep urban civilization in check.

Nothing could be more foreign to the reality in Israel. As a tiny country with a fast growing population and economy, space – both public and private – is in short supply.

Its dearth is felt every day in many forms: the relatively small homes most people live in, the insanely expensive real estate prices, the narrow roads, the danger of driving in Israel, the confining layout of most stores, the diminutive sidewalks, the lack of public parks, the small cars, the close proximity of tables in restaurants and cafes, the way people speak to each other, the way people push and shove, the lack of walk-in cupboards and storage facilities in most homes, the absence of forests and lakes, the woefully inadequate infrastructure at schools, the tight layout of supermarkets, the acute lack of parking for public or private buildings, the extreme sensitivity over the country's final borders… The list is endless.

The reasons for the above are quite understandable in such a small country. But as Israel becomes more westernized, so do people's expectations for new, bigger housing, more leisure and recreational pursuits, more cars, more highways. It all adds up to a much tighter squeeze – and growing concern over the long-term physical make-up of the country.

Figures published a few weeks ago by the Central Bureau of Statistics revealed what every citizen already knows only too well – that Israel is an extremely densely populated country. At 272 people per square kilometre, it is one of the most crowded nations in the world. It is more thickly settled than India (265 per square kilometre) and is fast approaching Japan (325 per square kilometre).

If one subtracts the sparsely inhabited Negev, the numbers are much worse. Israel north of the Negev is already more densely populated than any other country in the developed world except city-states like Hong Kong or Singapore. The figures are highest in Tel Aviv, with 6,600 people per square kilometre, (as compared to only 59 in the Negev).

In contrast to most western countries, Israel's population is increasing considerably every year – spurred on in part by generous financial incentives from the government favouring larger families. Within 25 years, the population is expected to reach nearly 11 million, based on current growth rates. All this in a country smaller than New Jersey, and more than half of which is scarcely inhabitable terrain.

A few years ago, in anticipation of what Israel will look like in 2020, a government-sponsored planning team came up with a sobering picture that resembles Singapore or Hong Kong much more than it does the largely rural landscape embraced by early Zionists. Israel, the researchers said, is heading toward a land crunch of massive proportions that will leave the non-urban sector decimated.

It's not hard to imagine, especially as Israel's building boom continues to devour the one scarce resource for which there is no alternative – land. Add to the equation the prospect of Israel giving up the Golan Heights and pulling back from more of the West Bank. Military training areas would have to be transferred and new housing built for tens of thousands of returning settlers within what would be Israel's new smaller borders.

Not for the first time, Israel must tackle a problem almost unthinkable to most of the world – an incredibly tiny country with terribly limited physical resources and a growing population must deal with the probability that its already confining borders will shrink further.

For now, I guess you could call Israel cozy and intimate. And on good days, it feels that way. But other times, claustrophobic would be a better word. I shudder to think what my children will say when they have families and would like to plan a weekend in the country. I suppose there will always be Cyprus, Greece and Turkey to provide Israelis with something, which by then may be an exotic experience.

Poisoning the wells

Shortly after Suha Arafat, the wife of the Rais (the self-styled president of the Palestinian Authority), made a speech charging Israel with poisoning Palestinian wells and spreading cancer with chemicals, a journalist asked me if she believed her own words.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

I do not claim to have any expertise or insights regarding the inner thoughts and beliefs of Arafat, nor can I comment on her views of Israel and Jews. However, I do know that these claims are not new, and a large number of Palestinians, as well as many Arabs around the Middle East, do believe them. For too many Arabs, Israel is still perceived in sinister and inhuman terms. In the Egyptian press, Israel is regularly accused of causing AIDS, or spreading drugs in candies.

The problem is not Suha, or the fact that Hilary Clinton was next to her on the stage in Ramallah, perhaps destroying the American First Lady's chances to be elected senator in New York.

Arafat does not write her own speeches, but rather, she read from a text that had been prepared for delivery before an audience of Arab VIPs and television cameras from around the world. This speech was cleared at the highest levels of the Palestinian Authority, with the explicit purpose of vilifying Israel. It was not an error in judgement, but rather a deliberate attempt to use the presence of Clinton and the international media to spread hatred.

While most of the commentators focused on Clinton's embarrassment, and the Americans demanded and received an apology (24 hours later, after Clinton had arrived in Jordan), none of this is relevant. What counts are the words uttered by Arafat, and their impact.

Palestinian "spin doctors" and officials refused to apologize and hid behind the claim that she was confused, and meant to criticize the Israeli use of tear gas, and not poison chemicals.

They did not attempt to explain the claim regarding water poisoning.

In the long history of the Jewish people, blood libels and vilification are nothing new, and now, as in the past, they provide the justification for terror and murder. The continued incitement to violence is at the core of the Arab-Israeli conflict and the clearest illustration of the failure of the entire Oslo process. Instead of moving actively to combat and counteract decades of antipathy that has fed terrorism and war, the Palestinian leadership, at the highest levels, continues its sponsorship of official hate speech.

Palestinian officials routinely use this kind of language regarding Israel. It appears in the official press, and is repeated in textbooks, and even on children's television shows. The incitement reinforces the myths of victimization, and strengthens the antipathy towards Israel.

Yet, many Israelis are too enamoured of the "peace process" to listen to these words. The major achievement of the Netanyahu government was to increase the focus on official Palestinian incitement. Unfortunately, in the effort to distance himself from Netanyahu, Prime Minister Barak lowered the priority placed on this issue.

In the face of official hatred and incitement, the rest of the world remains silent. The hundreds of millions of dollars in "economic assistance" provided by donor countries (most of which disappears in the Palestinian "kleptocracy," and is redirected into foreign bank accounts), keeps flowing.

Many officials and journalists continue to blame Israel and "expansion of settlements" for the failure of the Oslo process.

Palestinian incitement and the terrorism it produces is simply ignored. No sanctions are imposed, and Mr. Arafat and his ministers are still welcomed and treated with deference in the world's capitals.

As a result, Ms. Arafat's speechwriters had nothing to fear. The only problem for the Palestinians was smoothing the ruffled feathers in Washington. Had Hilary Clinton not been the audience, no one would have paid any attention to the speech. It did not contain anything that had not been said many times before. Indeed, evidence indicates that the Palestinian leadership deliberately sought to publicize these claims.

There are many anti-Semites ready to believe that Israel has been systematically contaminating water sources and using poison gas, "which has led to an increase in cancer and other horrible diseases among women and children."

In the "permanent status" talks designed to reach an overall agreement, the Palestinian representatives are now demanding "reparations for 30 years of occupation."

The truth is that instead of a "peace process," the Oslo agreement and its successors provide the Palestinians with a means of continuing the war against Israel by other means. As long as Palestinian and other Arab officials feel free to repeat the blood libels and other forms of incitement, the terrorism against Israel will continue. The continuation of business as usual following Suha Arafat's speech in Ramallah simply provides more evidence.

The Kirshner File

Visiting Egypt's remote oases

Egypt, rightly so, is synonymous with awe-inspiring antiquities – the pyramids, the tombs of the pharaohs, the ruins of ancient temples and the artifacts of the Egyptian Museum in Cairo.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Yet all too often, even discerning travellers overlook one of Egypt's most alluring and unforgettable destinations, the remote oases of the vast Western Desert: Kharga, Dakhla, Farafra and Bahariya. Last March and April, when the weather was perfectly temperate and the security situation seemed in hand, I visited them.

Looking for a relatively inexpensive and trouble-free way of getting there, I signed up for a three-week tour of Egypt offered by the British-based Explore company. (In Canada, Explore is represented by Trek Holidays in Edmonton, and the Adventure Centre in Toronto.)

Before setting off for the oases, I spent the first two weeks in Cairo, the Sinai Peninsula, Luxor, Aswan, Edfu, Kom Ombo and on a houseboat cruising the Nile.

Our Kharga-bound bus pulled out of Aswan early one morning, part of a cavalcade of two dozen buses, vans and automobiles to be escorted by police vehicles in a supposedly terrorist-proof convoy. Since 1992, Islamic fundamentalists have killed scores of foreign tourists, the last attack having occurred in Luxor's Valley of the Kings in November 1997. The perpetrators have deliberately targeted foreigners so as to wreak havoc on the tourist industry, one of the pillars of Egypt's economy.

The bus, with 16 persons aboard, was the only vehicle in the long convoy heading for the oases, an illustration of the fact that few tourists factor them into their itinerary. Even terrorists, I might add, have stayed clear of the oases.

Once we were safely out of the Nile Valley city of Assyut – an Islamic stronghold off bounds to tourists – and deep in the desert, the police car escorting us turned around and left us to our own devices.

Far from Egypt's main towns and cities, the oases are isolated entities onto themselves, distant from the hustle, bustle and bright lights of modern life. Not surprisingly, there was remarkably little traffic on the two-lane asphalt road to and from the oases.

Stretching in a sandy arc from Kharga to Bahariya, they were rescued from total obscurity by Gamal Abdel Nasser, the late president of Egypt. Eager to resettle fellahin (peasants) in the overpopulated ribbon of fertile land snaking along the Nile, Nasser channeled them into what he dubbed the New Valley.

Thanks to a fair abundance of water, which made it possible to cultivate date palms, wheat, vegetables, olives, citrus fruits and rice, Egyptians streamed into the oases. Yet 40 years on, Nasser's project of social engineering can hardly be called a roaring success. The Nile Delta and the Nile Valley are still bursting at the seams, while the oases remain sparsely populated. In other words, they are comparatively unspoiled, and for tourists in search of an exotic holiday, this is all for the good.

Contrary to what you may think, the oases are rather large. They do not even remotely resemble those tiny, romantic, palm-fringed oases that were a perennial staple of old Hollywood movies.

Kharga, with a population of approximately 80,000 concentrated in the somnolent town of Qasr Kharga, is about 200 kilometres in length and 30 kilometres in width. Prior to the 19th century, it lay on the slave route from Sudan. More recently, Nasser and his successors sent political opponents into exile in Kharga.

The scenery in and around Kharga was stirring – lush date plantations, swaying wheat fields and placid cow pastures offset by a bold and uplifting combination of stark plains and brooding escarpments whose bleak beauty shined through the aridity.

On the road to Kharga, we stopped to admire Watermelon Valley, dotted with thousands of rounded boulders uncannily shaped like watermelons. Later, on the outskirts of Kharga, we poked around the Temple of Hibis, distinguished by its stolid columns and clear reliefs. Built in the sixth century by Darius, a Persian emperor, the structure was discovered in 1909 under a mound of sand and rubble.

The temple was close to a palm date farm – whose busiest season runs from September to December – and the Necropolis of al-Bagawat, an abandoned Coptic Christian shrine of domed, mud-brick tombs more than 1000 years old. The tombs were in appalling condition, but one of them, the Chapel of the Exodus, was in good shape. I was irresistibly drawn to the crudely drawn biblical scenes on the ceiling of soldiers chasing the children of Israel across the Red Sea.

Dakhla is 2½ hours away from Kharga. The land between these oases was marked by lonely mesas and imposing tan mountain ranges. Cultivated patches of green broke up the harsh desert terrain.

There are 14 hamlets in Dakhla, which has 75,000 inhabitants, and Mut is the commercial centre. Mut is worth visiting for three reasons. The nearly deserted mud-brick village of Al Qasr, dominated by a souring minaret, is an intriguing medieval warren of crumbling buildings, dark and mysterious passageways and rustic pottery workshops. The ethnographic museum highlights Bedouin culture, while the thermal hot springs is bracingly refreshing.

On my second day in Dakhla, I enjoyed a camel trek through yellowish desert wastes punctuated by two shimmering saltwater lakes, a dip in a muddy swimming hole, and a night camping out under the stars. The lunar desert floor adjacent to our camp was littered with black balls, which turned out to be camel dung.

En route to Farafra, the least visited or populated oasis, the cultivated land soon gave way to a monotonous gravel pan and then an absolutely flat, eerie plain. We were on the periphery of the Great Sand Sea, an all but impassable region of gigantic sand dunes which sweep inexorably into Libya. Farafra itself was unimpressive, a dusty, flyblown burg where the glare of the sun was blinding at noon.

The high point of the oasis was indubitably the White Desert – a vista of fantastic, otherworldly limestone formations and deposits which bear an uncanny resemblance to snow and icebergs in a cobalt sea. I was enchanted by the sheer solitude and the splintered rocks which tingled under my feet like shattered glass. As in Dakhla, we camped under a starry sky. For breakfast, there was a special treat: pita baked in hot embers and sand.

Bahariya, with six hamlets and a population of 25,000, is noted for its dense date plantations. In Bawiti, the main town, I bought several boxes of dried dates.

Bahariya's chief attractions are the Black Desert, an unrelieved expanse of black basalt rock which disintegrates at the touch; the forlorn remains of a British World War I fortress atop wind-swept Black Mountain; and the Bir Ghaba hot springs.

The landscape from Bahariya to Cairo was a veritable moonscape. But as we got closer to the Egyptian capital, patches of green and the faint outlines of contemporary and ancient civilizations – October 6 City and the tips of the Giza pyramids – mingled in the hazy distance. The oases suddenly seemed far away, in another world.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Financial glitter

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Not long ago, a member of the tuition committee of a local day school related to me a bizarre sample of encounters he had endured with parents who could well afford to pay for their children's education.

Somehow they had mistaken the milieu for nothing less than a Middle Eastern marketplace with him as the shadowy trinket merchant open to endless negotiation. One man yelled poverty with a flip of his $10,000 Rolex wrist; another pleaded that he was trying to pay off his mortgage in 10 years and hence had little capital available for the unfortunate inconvenience of school. Yet another man actually threatened, in ominous tones, that harm would come to this tuition committee head if the numbers on the bottom line weren't lowered.

Question: would this last gentleman's behaviour have impressed his children had they witnessed it? Would they have felt the moral power and necessity of a Jewish education, the one that their father had received before them?

More questions: has material success jaded contemporary Jewry? Or more accurately – certain Jews, who seem immune to the plight of their neighbours?

We are blessed with enormous financial opportunities, but not all are so well off. I have seen cases where multimillionaires live five minutes away from fellow Jews living in penury, without the slightest "knowledge" of the poverty down the block or even next door. Because we know what we want to know and see what we want to see.

Bar and bat mitzvahs. Shabbat and yom tov clothes. Chanukah presents. Summer camps. Vacations. The above are just some of the ways in which the divide between wealthier and poorer Jews is in plain view. (Not to mention simply paying the rent or mortgage and putting food on the table.)

The gaudy values on display at many posh religious events belie the purportedly moral purpose informing the proceedings. That is a polite way of saying that religious hypocrisy has become a way of life, an ethic so ingrained that no amount of exhortation from the pulpit can change what is now de rigueur.

And as usual, it is the kids who are the sharpest observers of their parents' ostentatiousness, as an ugly competitiveness seeps into our children's souls, in which their classmates are silently and even subconsciously rated and screened.

Rabbi Moshe Chaim Luzzatto, in the opening chapter of his classical work Mesillat Yesharim, notes that all affairs of the world end up being a challenge to a person, "poverty on the one hand and wealth on the other… serenity on the one hand and suffering on the other, so that the battle rages against him from in front and from the rear."

If the pain of poverty is the unavoidable war that looms directly in one's path, then the complacency that sometimes accompanies material success is the war from behind, the one less visible and thus all the more dangerous for being harder to defend against.

Naturally poverty no more guarantees moral rectitude than wealth implies a declining ethical stance; such a simplistic equation is absurd. But one thing is plain: money often changes not only the person who has it but the people he meets. The body language of everyone concerned – the rabbi, the school principal, the bank manager – all seem subtly altered when financial glitter walks through the door. On this Chanukah, may God bless his people with the light of compassion and the courage of self examination. And my knight on the tuition committee could use a new coat of armour.

Chanukah favourites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Chanukah is almost upon us. Time once again for another instalment of my reasons to travel the Jewish Highway:

Reason No. 1: The Sites

The single best holiday site belongs to Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.vjholidays.com/chanukah/index.htm]. In one mega-site you can browse through the history of the holiday, its traditions, a menorah gallery and a special place for kids.

Always different and thought provoking, look at Jewish Holidays [http://www.jflhanukkah.com].

Chabad-Lubavitch Chanukah99 runs one of the slickest sites around [http://www.chanukah99.com/]. There is a guide to the holiday, a look at the mitzvot, tales of tzaddikim, recipes and quite a few multimedia pages. Other Chanukah sites well worth a visit include Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning [http://www.kolel.org/pages/holidays/holidays.html], Aish HaTorah [http://aish.net/a/chanukah60/], Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=128], Project Genesis [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/chanukah/] and Ohr Somayach [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/chanukah/].

Reason No. 2: The Sights

One of the central aspects of Chanukah is publicizing the miracle. We fulfil the mitzvah by lighting Chanukah candles in a window and by placing menorahs in public places [http://www.virtualjerusalem.com/clients/destiny/miketzchan59.htm]. You can travel to Paris, Buenos Aires, Cairo, California, Madrid, Moscow to see menorahs light up their public squares [http:// www. chabad-lubavitch.com/lights/video_content.asp]. Then, come home to Israel and view that day's candle-lighting ceremony at the Kotel [http://www.vjholidays.com/chanukah/mengallery.htm].

Reason No. 3: The Sounds

Where would Chanukah be without music? At the Aish Hatorah site, listen to Chanukah, Oh Chanukah, Maoz Tzur, I Have a Little Dreidel and more [http://www.aish.edu/calendar/chanukah/songs.html]. The lyrics are printed at this site so you can sing along.

Over at the Ort site [http://www.ort.org/ort/hanukkah/song.html], there is sheet music for Maoz Tzur, Mi Yemalel and Chanukah.

The largest Chanukah audio site must belong to 613.org [http://www.613.org/chanuka.html]. You can listen to songs, get a refresher in the blessings over the candles and take part in lessons about the holiday. Kids may enjoy having a bedtime story read to them [http://www.vjholidays.com/chanukah/bedstor.htm]. Click on the link and every night Shmuel Blitz will read another tale from his Treasury of Bedtime Stories.

Reason No. 4: The Games

Spinning a dreidel is one of the simple joys of Chanukah. Sure you can buy a commercial dreidel, but why not just make one yourself. The BillyBear4kids has instructions for making your own. [http://billybear4kids.com/holidays/hanukkah/pattern.htm]

If you want to take on the computer in a dreidel competition, spin your luck at [http://www.jcn18.com/spin-ns.htm] or at [http://billybear4kids.com/holidays/hanukkah/dreidel2.htm].

Find other holiday challenges at [http://billybear4kids. com/holidays/hanukkah/hanukkah.htm].

Test yourself with the Chanukah Quiz [http://www. mznet.org/holidays/chanukah/chanquiz.html] and then try a test at The Virtual Jerusalem site [http://www.vjholidays.com/chanukah/quiz.htm]. E-mail your answers to them during the holiday, and you may win a T-shirt.

And at the TorahTots site, you can play Plopples [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/chanuka/chanfng.htm]. Plopples? Here are two samples. Read each phrase aloud a few times to see if you can sound out their messages:

- pot ate tall hot car
- nay scud ole higher sham

Rabbinic Reflections

Festival of real life

By RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ

As the familiar song says: "Chanukah is coming to town."

More and more, Chanukah has become more visible and widely observed. Somehow we have developed an affinity between ourselves and Chanukah.

Maybe it is because of the story – the many in the hands of the few, the supposedly strong giving way to the assumed meek. Maybe it's because it's such an easy holiday to observe. We can't go wrong with family gatherings, latkes, sufganiyot, presents and candles.

Or maybe it is even because we need a more public reaction to the prevailing festival themes of the December season. The reason isn't material. Chanukah is in. It is a time for celebration.

Now that we have accepted Chanukah as a given, there are additional lessons to be learned.

For instance, take the dreidel. A simple and wonderful game that keeps us occupied for hours.

We know that the dreidel contains the four letters that sort of summarize the entire story of Chanukah. The nun, the gimel, the hey and the shin — representing Nes Gadol Hayah Sham. It says it all in such a short and concise way.

On some letters you win and on some letters you lose, and on one of the letters nothing happens at all.

That in itself is a lesson of life. Depending on how the dreidel of life falls, you can win or lose, or stand still. The dreidel keeps spinning – as life itself keeps moving onward. In case things do not fall right, we just have to make sure we stay long enough to have another chance at the spin.

With a slight twist, we can perhaps see the letters in a slightly different light:

Nun – not just nes but nisyonot. Not just miracles – but challenges and decision making. That is in fact what life is all about. Our ability to overcome nisyonot that occur every day. To use the gift of being alive is to play a winning hand.

Gimel – does not just represent gadol – but gedula. Our singular actions can change the climate of society, can influence others. How I deal with my ongoing challenges of life can be the badge of courage and glory that I wear.

Hey – not just representing haya – was, but hoveh v'yihyea – is and will continue to be. It is today's battles and today's triumphs that will make the difference as to the nature of tomorrow. While the beacon of light comes from the past, its light charts a course unto tomorrow.

Shin – not only representing sham – there, but to be read shem – meaning your name. Our response to the challenges of life, who we are and what we are. Our very shem is a result of our ongoing relationship with people, places and things.

Yes, Chanukah and the dreidel teach us that life is more than just a game of chance. Life affords us many chances, and no matter how we land, on the nun or the gimel or the hey or the shin, we can come up a true winner.

It is in our power to turn it around and use each and every one of the stops along the way represented by our dreidel as a building block for the future. Wherever our dreidel of life lands – there is another spin, another turn yet to come. As long as we are truly alive, we will have ample opportunity to get the appropriate and correct spin on the dreidel called life.

Is Chanukah a great holiday? Absolutely! It is the festival of real life, of everyday living, of everyday success. We should celebrate and enjoy our ongoing success. Play some dreidel, eat some latkes, say the blessings and enjoy the lights with the family. This is life. Let the dreidel of life make us each the winners we deserve to be.

Pope's actions examined

Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII*, by John Cornwell (Viking, $42).

Books
Bernard Baskin

The author of this attack on Eugenio Pacelli, Pope Pius XII, is a Catholic journalist and a research fellow in history at Cambridge. The assault, however, was not unprecedented. As far back as 1963 Rolf Hochhuth's play The Deputy had depicted Pacelli as a ruthless cynic, more interested in the Vatican's stockholding than in the fate of the Jews.

Cornwell was convinced, as a faithful son of the Church, that if the full story was told, Pacelli would be vindicated. In seeking new material for this biography he was granted access to hitherto unseen archives and letters.

Nearing the end of his research, Cornwell found himself in a state of moral shock. His depiction of the Pope's beliefs and actions amounted, not to an exoneration, but to even wider indictment. The Pope, he discovered, was a long-time anti-Semite and a Nazi collaborator, more zealous to obtain favour for the Church and to fight communism than to save lives – especially Jewish ones.

What the author finds especially distasteful – and even monstrous – is that Pacelli is being seriously considered for canonization.

In 1933, as the Vatican's secretary of state, Pacelli negotiated a concordat with Germany which guaranteed the withdrawal of Catholics from social and political action, effectively frustrating anti-Nazi opposition. Hitler exulted that the agreement "created an area of trust which is particularly significant in the developing battle against international Jewry."

The author maintains that Pius XII never condemned either Hitler or the Nazis by name. Even more strikingly, he never mentioned specifically the sufferings of the Jews, though he was perfectly aware of them and though many people, both clergy and lay diplomats, pleaded with him constantly to issue a public condemnation.

A journalist described the situation when, in October 1943, Jews were rounded up in Rome, "the cattle trucks drove past St. Peter's, the tiny shivering hands of the incarcerated children hanging through the slats, so that the SS officers who had been drafted in could see the sights of the Eternal City. The pope, safe in St. Peter's, still said nothing at all."

Jews, when all was said and done, were viewed traditionally as enemies of the Church "reaping worldly and spiritual ruin" from the killing of Jesus.

Today, the Vatican in its defence of Pacelli argues that he worked behind the scenes to rescue Jews and that a public protest would only have provoked more vicious Nazi attacks against Jews – and perhaps even against the pope himself.

Pinchas Lapide in his book, The Last Three Popes and the Jews (1967), offers an enthusiastic appraisal of Pacelli who he believes indirectly saved the lives of thousands of Jews. Cornwell argues that Lapide was so eager that Israel be recognized by the Vatican that his book "carries the taint of diplomatic self-interest."

The author traces the pope's life from his early years as a brilliant lawyer, to his role as wily diplomatic ambassador to Munich and Berlin during the 1920s, to his status as pope during the war and then to his final 13 years.

The author reveals astonishing facts about Pacelli's eccentricities during his later years. Before public appearances his hands would be doused with antiseptic lotion to avoid transmission of germs. He would ride a mechanical horse in full equestrian gear and Vatican personnel were obliged to take telephone calls from him on their knees.

The wheel of history, undoubtedly, would have turned in a less calamitous direction if a more courageous and less hidebound Pope had served during the tragic wartime years.

Prof. examines violence against Palestinian women

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While researching femicide, or the killing of women, Nadera Shalhoub-Kevorkian found a death certificate citing old age as the cause of death for a 24-year-old woman.

She also found records stating that women had died of high blood pressure, or other medical reasons, when she believes they were victims of murder.

Last week at York University, Kevorkian, a professor in the faculty of law at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, spoke at a talk titled, Breaking the Silence: Violence Against Women in Palestinian Society.

Kevorkian has spent 10 years researching violence against women, and five years ago she introduced the first hotline in the Middle East for abused Palestinian women.

During her talk, Kevorkian spoke about the grotesque killings she discovered while researching femicide and while working at the Women's Centre For Legal Aid and Counselling, a clinic she and a group of women opened in 1993, located between Jerusalem and Ramallah.

In one particularly gruesome example, a woman who was seven months pregnant went to her brother and father for help to escape an abusive husband. They sent her back to her husband who abused her again by pouring acid on her stomach.

The woman went to a friend and a friend's father for help. When her brother, who suspected her of having an extramarital affair, found out about this, he brutally killed her, cutting her unborn baby out of her stomach.

While working at the clinic, Kevorkian discovered that nothing was being done to help or expose the issue of women killing.

"Some people say it doesn't exist," she said in an interview following the talk.

So, Kevorkian began collecting data from formal sources, such as the police, the ministry of health and the attorney general, as well as from informal sources, such as heads of tribes and clans.

This data was the best way to prevent people from denying abuse, she said in the interview.

The statistics she received revealed vast discrepancies. For example, while tribal heads each said they handled between 10 and 15 cases of women killed in Hebron annually, the police said they only handled one case per year.

Kevorkian believes that to prevent femicide, the laws governing Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza which are based on Jordanian laws, French laws and laws from the former Ottoman Empire, must be changed.

One law states that a male who kills or injures a female is exempted if he caught the woman in fornication with another man.

Nadera Shalhoub-Kevorkian

Another states that murder is justified if the victim dishonored the murderer or his family.

The attitude amongst judges, prosecutors and family members is often that if the victim is dead, why should they defend her instead of the perpetrator of the crime whom they say has a whole life ahead of him, Kevorkian said.

"They try ... to blame the victim – to help the offender get out of court without a sentence," she said.

Kevorkian tries to work with families instead of looking at them as the enemy.

To help women in danger, Kevorkian sometimes asks relatives to sign a contract, which she wrote but admits is not legal, stating they will not change a woman's lifestyle by forbidding her to go to school or take medication, won't abuse or kill her or help her commit suicide.

"It means a lot to victims of abuse that their mother or father acknowledges the pain," she said.

Kevorkian's talk was sponsored by the Toronto chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU), Women: An Agenda for Change (a program of the Toronto chapter of the CFHU) and York University's School of Women's Studies.

Children are real victims of family poverty

By NAOMI ROSE

Last week, Canada-wide vigils were held to mark the federal government's failure to eradicate child poverty by the year 2000.

Guest Voices

It has been 10 years since the promise was made, and child poverty not only exists but has dramatically increased.

As Jews and Canadians who care about children, it is important to support these vigils and make our feelings known.

But the real issue is not child poverty, it's family poverty. Children suffer when their families suffer. If parents are unemployed or underemployed, the lack of adequate child care, housing or food affects the whole family.

Research indicates that several factors contribute to family poverty – among them – income, level of education, marital status, and renting vs. owning one's home.

According to other studies, the development of children is severely affected if the essential qualities of a safe, healthy home are not in place.

Early experiences affect their health, self-esteem, ability to learn, and ultimately, their chance of successfully contributing to society. Children who live in poor families are less likely to have the necessary tools to achieve their potential.

Unfortunately, the Jewish community is not immune to poverty. Approximately 4,000 Jewish families in the Greater Toronto Area live below the poverty line as defined by Statistics Canada. Furthermore, nearly half of all Jewish single parent families, headed by females, live in poverty.

At UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, we have identified assisting the vulnerable as one of our top priorities. Impoverished children and their families receive assistance through Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS), including counselling, clothing, camp subsidies, and Passover food allowances.

Over 300 children under 18 years old receive assistance from JF&CS because their families live in poverty. Our community also pays for a job training and placement program run by JF & CS in concert with Jewish Vocational Service, to help clients find jobs to improve their lives and those of their families. In addition, significant community funds assist many needy Jewish families in Toronto in the form of day school tuition subsidies.

This year, because of increased annual campaign contributions, UJA Federation has been able to provide a larger allocation to help offset some government cuts to welfare and other programs intended to help needy families.

Since 1989, a government funded think-tank called the National Council of Welfare has recommended ways to erase the scourge of child poverty.

The government of Canada is on record as supporting this vital goal. Now, 10 years later, the Council has released a pre-budget analysis titled Children First, strongly urging the federal government to bring down a budget that emphasizes children's programming and tax benefits for struggling parents.

We in the Jewish community believe that the best solutions support families to raise their children in dignity and health. We encourage Jews across the country to actively promote this objective. In the spirit of tikkun olam, we must act together to heal the world.

Naomi Rose is the chair of social planning and allocations, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Women's rights advocate reflects on her successes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alice Shalvi, a leading Israeli women's rights advocate, remembers the exact moment she realized something had to be done about women's equality in Israel.

"In 1972, I was not appointed to a top academic post because I was a woman, despite the fact that I was the right person for the job. The very notion of a woman being a dean at a university was unimaginable to the administration."

Things are a lot better now, she says, but "it has required a very active woman's movement."

Shalvi, 73, is rector of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, and founding chair of Israel Women's Network, a non-partisan coalition and advocacy group dedicated to advancing the status of women in Israel, and implementing a feminist agenda for justice and equality. She was in Toronto recently to give a talk sponsored by UJA Federation and Women's Campaign.

"With due modesty, I have played an active role in making Israeli society aware of the inequalities, and having them corrected," she said in an interview before the lecture.

Shalvi, known as the mother of Israeli feminism, says that women now hold 14 seats in the Knesset, out of a total of 120 seats. "It is not a significant representation, but it is more than we've ever had. There are also two ministers; I think we're making progress. The half-empty glass is filling, but it is still not full."

The mother of six and grandmother of 18, was brought up as an Orthodox Jew, but now prays at an egalitarian minyan. "I haven't changed my lifestyle; I am no less observant. I've just changed where I worship.

"I accept the Conservative attitude to Halachah. We need to keep reinterpreting things in light of societal norms. Judaism must enable us to accept the new reality of the changing status of women."

It is totally illogical, she said, that "women can be on the Supreme Court, yet even with the proper knowledge, cannot sit on a [bet din]. You cannot close a whole important area of life to a woman.

"I am quite happy now to participate in services as fully as any man. It was an overwhelming experience to have my first aliyah. I was 53, and it was the first time I had seen a Torah scroll up front and inside.

"I then became angry that I had to wait 40 years for what a male does when he is 13, even if it is a meaningless experience for him," she says.

Alice Shalvi

She wants to be fully involved in the religion, and wants all other women to have the same opportunity. "Jewish women and girls should be able to study Torah, in order to be fully aware and equipped to practise their religion.

"For years, I didn't go to synagogue because I felt so marginalized. The more I knew, and the more I felt I was able to contribute something [to the religion], the more marginalized I felt."

She urges women of all ages to study and be knowledgeable. "Knowledge – both formal and self-taught – is the key to everything. A woman needs to be able to stand up for her position, and she has to come up with the facts. Knowledge is power."

Even in Orthodox circles, she says, women can have separate study groups and take part in such things as Rosh Chodesh rituals. "Orthodox women are being influenced by the Conservative and Reform movements. A lot is happening."

As women, she says, "we need to ask ourselves if we are equal members of society whose contributions are valued as equal to men, or if we are just support.

"I am asking women to ensure that we have an equal place at the table – that we have equal say and equal-representation."

ORT helping to bring technology around the globe

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A pilot project launched two months ago by the World ORT Union introduced senior citizens in London, England, to the wonders of technology.

Within a short time, Robert Singer, director general of the World ORT Union, was watching 75- and 80-year-olds working on computers in ORT labs, some e-mailing grandchildren as young as five year olds.

"After a week, suddenly you see that their fear is not there anymore. For them, it's a new life. Suddenly, the world is open," he said.

Singer spoke recently at the North York home of the national president of ORT Canada, as part of an international tour to provide information about the worldwide activities of ORT, an organization that provides technological and vocational training programs.

Singer, who worked in the Prime Minister's Office in Israel for 12 years, was appointed director general of the World ORT Union, the governing and planning arm of ORT, in April.

Robert Singer

During the talk, Singer referred to several ORT initiatives including a new curriculum for studying technology, called Technology For All (TFA).

TFA, developed in Israel and now being implemented in Great Britain and Russia, integrates technology into every subject, instead of having students learn about technology in isolation, such as in a separate class, he said.

"Many people are afraid of technology. In this way, it becomes part of their everyday thinking," Singer said.

If the program succeeds, ORT may expand it to as many as 80 schools in Great Britain, he said.

Another high-tech initiative is an English as a Second Language learning program launched in London two weeks ago.

A teacher there runs classes for students all over the world via the Internet. It took two years to develop and now receives about 6,000 hits per day, Singer said.

He also discussed a pilot project that trains Chassidim for different professions.

"They spend all their time in yeshivas and suddenly have to work." ORT wants to introduce this program without damaging their way of life, Singer said.

It is important for ORT to become more active in developed countries, he said. ORT has traditionally helped "distressed" communities, but now "people want to see that ORT is providing knowledge and advantages in their communities."

In its efforts to provide local programs, Toronto ORT is sponsoring an intitiative to help 24 under-achieving students from grades 6 to 9 improve their study and computer skills.

The program, which began at the end of October at Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto's (JVS) head office, is being offered in partnership with Jewish Campus Services, Jewish Family and Child Service, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and JVS.

To involve more countries in its decision-making process, the organization will be changing the criteria for representation on the World ORT Union board, Singer said.

Under a new formula, each country's representation will be determined according to the size of its Jewish population, the number of students attending ORT schools and the amount fund-raised in that country.

While ORT is reaching out to other countries, Israel and the Former Soviet Union (FSU) are still its main priority, he said.

Forty percent of ORT's students are in Israel, where highly skilled ORT graduates are needed even more than in the past, he said.

In the former Soviet Union, many citizens who used to work for the government need to be trained in new professions because of the changing market, and people emigrating to other countries also need requalification.

ORT has four schools and one college in the FSU and plans to open four more centres to train people in technical skills, Singer said.

Latin America is third on ORT's list of priority countries, because due to the economic situation there, many students cannot pay their tuition, he said.

In Kosovo, where ORT has three schools, it is considering opening eight more.

In a month, ORT plans to open vocational training centres in Kosovo, and at the same time, teach people to produce items like windows and doors for schools and houses.

Lastman stresses city's need for funding at UJA meet

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Being Jewish has helped, not hurt his political career, Mayor Mel Lastman said last week.

"I haven't felt anti-Semitism in the city of Toronto at all," but being Jewish means you have to work harder to prove yourself, he said.

Lastman was speaking at Outlook 2000, an event sponsored by the professional and business divisions of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

While the event was a good networking opportunity for the professionals who attended, it also provided a means of heightening the profile of the UJA campaign, said Andrew Freedman, co-chair of Outlook 2000.

Toronto has the fastest growing Jewish population in North America, and with that growth, the number of elderly and frail Torontonians is increasing, said David Engel, co-chair of UJA Federation's Campaign 2000. Thousands of Jews live below the poverty line, he said.

In his speech, Lastman complained because Toronto pays for its own social services, housing and welfare.

That should be the responsibility of the provincial and federal governments, he said, adding that Toronto also receives no money for transit.

During the question and answer period, an audience member said driving around Toronto has become difficult and asked why no new roads are being built.

"If you added more streets, all you'd have is more traffic," Lastman responded.

The solution, he said, is to build more north-south subway lines.

The Gardiner Expressway will eventually come down because it is falling apart. When it does, streets like Lakeshore Boulevard and Front Street will be widened, he said.

Asked how he would ensure that Toronto is not saddled with the same type of debt Montreal incurred after the 1976 Olympics, Lastman said the federal and provincial government, together with the International Olympic Committee (IOC), will help fund the Olympics. In addition, he said, Toronto will try to use existing facilities instead of building new ones.

Planned projects, such as the revitalization of the Yonge and Dundas area and the development of the waterfront, will make it difficult for the IOC to turn down Toronto's bid for the Olympics, he said.

"Yonge and Dundas will be bigger and brighter than Times Square in New York City," he said, speaking of the planned public square, entertainment complex and economic development.

New organization launched for Holocaust survivors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The mission of the newly formed Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada is to represent survivors and speak on their behalf with a unified voice.

At a recent meeting, Gerda Frieberg, president, said the independent organization has been formed in order to gather information, inform and assist aging Canadian Holocaust survivors.

Another mandate of the organization, she said, is to seek representation at the Jewish Claims Conference and United Restitution Organization on behalf of Canadian Holocaust survivors.

"Survivors cannot reclaim what was taken from them, and their losses cannot be measured. We do, however, seek acknowledgement for lost family, lost property, stolen art and valuables, wages for slave labour and unclaimed insurance claims.

"Many survivors live in poverty, and have no knowledge of how to fill out an application for things that are owed to them. We understand their needs and their pain. We, too, have the nightmares. It is time that survivors began to make decisions and help other survivors," she said.

Frieberg, who has been chair of the founding committee, Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto UJA Federation, chair of the National Holocaust Remembrance Committee, and chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said that CJC has been "very supportive. An independent organization is necessary, however, because survivors need other survivors to speak for them. We can answer their needs, help them and advise them."

Michael Rosenberg, vice-president, said there are financial issues behind forming the organization, but it is not solely financial. "We have no one to speak on our behalf. Our country absorbed the third largest number of survivors, and we merit representation."

It is time to discover where survivors live, how many survivors there are, and then have them registered, Rosenberg said. "If we have a central office from which we can accumulate information, we will be able to help more people."

Many survivors do not know what to put on the application forms, said Elsa Chandler, secretary of the organization, who initiated the development of the Holocaust curriculum unit at the North York Board of Education. "Memories are hard to put on paper, and many survivors do not want to recall what happened. I think that we are sensitive to their needs because we share a great deal.

"It is not about money. For most of us, money will not change our lifestyle. It is more about a feeling that we are not being heard."

Survivors are frustrated, said Hank Rosenbaum, treasurer. There is no central point for them to turn to get information. It would benefit us to run our own affairs. We have to help fellow survivors in any way we can."

Arnold Friedman, an executive member at large, said "we all belong to various organizations, and we are involved in all areas of the community, yet when we seek a common denominator, we are confused.

"There is no organized information dissemination program. It is time we started taking issues with these matters. In another five or 10 years, our children will have to deal with our memories."

The organization is just getting off the ground, said Chandler, "and our only promise is to represent survivors where there is a need. We are taking our first step today."

A press release from Canadian Jewish Congress announced that it has approved the transfer of $10,000 to the Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada. The funds were generated from the 1985 conference, Gathering of Canadian Holocaust Survivors and Their Children, held in Ottawa. CJC has been holding the funds in trust for Holocaust remembrance and education.

Other members of the executive include Robert Engel, Nate Leipciger and Ralph Snow. There are also board members from Vancouver, Calgary, Ottawa, Winnipeg, and Montreal. Legal counsel is Sydney Gangbar.

Federal government studying UN ruling

Harris Tories were considering cutting $800 million from education.

In the meantime, the federal government is studying the UN ruling, deputy prime minister Herb Gray told The CJN in a telephone interview.

The government "will not be able to provide a public response until the decision is studied and consultation is undertaken with the government of Ontario," Gray said.

Education, he stressed, "is clearly a provincial matter under the constitution. The federal government has no legislative or oversight authority over any provincial government on matters of education. But we have said the federal government will be engaging in consultation with the Ontario government."

Legally, the ruling is not binding on Canada. Gray said he's not aware of any punitive measures the UN could impose on Canada should the decision be ignored or inadequately addressed.

But as far as Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region is concerned, the decision is binding "in the sense that Canada has contracted to abide by UN conventions and agreements.

"On one level," Landy told The CJN, "Canada is thumbing its nose at the treaty it contracted to abide by [through Ontario's current stance]. How does that lend credence to Canada holding its head high on human rights?"

And Landy dismissed arguments that Canada's hands are tied on education.

"There are so many checks and balances available, like transfer payments [to provinces]. If the federal government really wanted to bring Ontario into line, it has ample resources."

His views were echoed by Toronto MP Joe Volpe, who has been the only member of the federal government to raise the UN ruling within the Liberal caucus.

"I have a large Orthodox constituency and they incur huge [education] costs," Volpe, the MP for Eglinton-Lawrence, told The CJN. "They deserve a break."

Volpe says he has received over 100 letters and calls urging Canada to comply with the UN's findings.

That's not as easy as it sounds, he noted.

Education, he too explained, falls under provincial jurisdiction.

MP cites surplus

However, there is some "leeway" the federal government can exercise, mainly in income tax guidelines that may offer relief for parents of children in private schools.

Volpe dismissed the argument that Ontario can't afford to fund private and independent schools.

He said the large federal surplus in the last budget allowed Ottawa to immediately hand over to Ontario a lump sum of $1.4 billion for health and education, as well as up to $400 million a year in extra transfer payments.

"The financial issue can't be a problem anymore."

As for the constitutionally mandated control of education by the provinces, Ontario could, if it wanted, ask Ottawa to amend the constitution to allow the province to change the way it funds schools, Volpe said.

Ottawa, he said, has already done that twice before: once for Newfoundland, where control over education was shifted away from the Catholic church; and in Quebec, where school boards were changed from being run along religious lines, to linguistic ones.

Volpe said he's in favor of a voucher system over the awarding of straight government grants to school boards. Vouchers, he said, would allow parents to spend public funds no matter what school their child attends.

That means the money is portable, and follows the child even if he or she changes schools.

Ultimately, Canada must respond to the UN in some way, Volpe said, even though the onus is on Ontario.

"We're defending something that has nothing to do with us jurisdictionally."

Also last week, Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen, wrote to Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy and Justice Minister Anne McLellan, noting that when Canada was found to have violated international agreements in the past, it moved quickly to remedy the situation.

Congress adds it would be "unfortunate" if Ontario's funding policy tarnishes Canada's image.

As well, Landy wrote to Ontario Premier Mike Harris, pointing out that Canada signed the relevant international treaty on civil and political rights in accord with the 10 provinces, and thus "has both the legal and ethical obligation to abide by the ruling of the UN."

Landy called on Harris to work with Ottawa to ensure compliance with the UN's decision.

Conservative Judaism urged to adapt to change

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Young people in Conservative congregations who are "turned on" by Camp Ramah or a youth program must be seen as an asset, not as kids who don't fit in any more, says the vice-president of Mercaz USA, the American Conservative Zionist organization.

In a recent lecture at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Saul Shapiro told a group of about 65 people that the same factors that keep Conservative youngsters from intermarrying, also cause them to move into Orthodox synagogues.

"If the kids need a separate minyan, the kind of minyan they get at Ramah, that has to be given to them," said Shapiro, a market research specialist who co-authored the 1979 report The Future of Conservative Judaism, and who is also a board member of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

The future of Conservative Judaism is "in our hands," said Shapiro.

The differences between Canada and the United States are greater than Shapiro had anticipated, he said.

Based variously on 1990 and 1995 statistics, the most recent available, the differences he noted include:

• About one third of Jews in the United States have been to Israel, compared to two thirds of their Canadian counterparts.

• 67 percent of Jews in Canada belong to a synagogue, compared to only 50 percent in the U.S.

• Although Conservative-affiliated Jews in both countries represent an equivalent population segment (45 percent in the United States, 43 percent in Canada), the United States has a larger Reform sector compared to the Orthodox sector. In Canada, the reverse is true.

• Canadian Jews have a lower intermarriage rate than their American counterparts. Shapiro noted, however, that attitudes toward intermarriage have become more accepting, and that the rate here has risen from seven percent in 1961 to 25 percent today.

• No Canadian Conservative synagogues have parties with music on Shabbat. In the United States, depending on geographic region, from 21 percent (East Coast) to 53 percent (West Coast) do.

• Fewer than half of the Conservative congregations in Canada count women in a minyan (according to a 1995-96 survey). In the United States the vast majority do – 96 percent on the West Coast, 83 percent on the more traditional East Coast.

With Conservative Judaism moving to the left, ideologically, and Reform becoming more traditional, the boundaries of the two denominations are approaching one another, Shapiro noted.

He declined to predict, however, whether Conservative Judaism would retain a distinctive identity in the future.

Conservative synagogue members tend to be "less ritually observant" than their parents, Shapiro said. "What that means is, if the children of Conservative members see that their parents are less committed than their grandparents, there's a message that it's okay for [them] to be a little less committed."

What happens at home influences whether children will intermarry, and what type of connection they will have to Judaism, he noted.

Canada does "uniformly better," he said, citing higher incidences here of Seder attendance, fasting on Yom Kippur, lighting Shabbat candles and keeping two sets of dishes – among all denominations.

"You have to put priority on Jewish family and Jewish education," Shapiro advised, including youth groups and Camp Ramah in the latter category.

To get "more bang for the buck," focus should be put on the years when children are at home, he added.

If there's any place the strategy can work, it's Canada, he said. "You have advantages we never had."

Three Jewish youth win in Amadeus Choir contest

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three musically talented Jewish youngsters have proven that they are not one-hit-wonders.

Cassandra Luftspring, 11, Aaron Schwebel, 11 and Laura Silberberg, 13, have won once again in the Amadeus Choir's annual Christmas Carol and Chanukah Song Writing Competition.

Cassandra and Laura tied in the Chanukah, Harmony, Accompanied, child 14 and under category. Cassandra wrote a new song, Hanukah Lights, while Laura won for composing new music for the traditional Chanukah song Mi Y'Malel.

Aaron won an honourable mention in the Unison, Accompanied, child 14 and under category for his composition A Chanukah Song for the Millenium. He was also presented with the Special Conductor's Award for Best Original Text.

Their compositions, along with those of the other winners, will be presented at the choir's Celebrate with Brass! concert, at the George Weston Recital Hall of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts on Dec. 5, at 3 p.m.

The 115-voice choir is under the direction of Lydia Adams. Special guest at the concert is The Bach Children's Chorus.

Cassandra is in the special arts elementary program at Baythorn Public School in Thornhill. She also studies piano, composition, music theory and voice. She won first place in her class at this year's Kiwanis Festival for playing piano.

Laura is in Grade 8 at the Claude Watson School for the Arts. She studies piano, electone guitar, violin and percussion, and has performed original compositions in London, Winnipeg, Boston, San Diego, and Tokyo, as well as Toronto.

She has also won awards at the Kiwanis and York Region music festivals. She is a competitive dancer with TNT Danceforce.

A Grade 6 student at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Aaron has been playing violin since he was seven. He is still studying violin, as well as voice. He was in the a cappella choir of the Toronto Children's Chorus.

The Christmas Carol and Chanukah Song Writing Competition draws entries from composers around the world.

CHANUKAH SONG FOR THE MILLENNIUM

This poem was written and set to music by 11-year-old Aaron Schwebel, the winner of the first Amadeus Choir Conductor's award for best original text.

By Aaron Schwebel

We are so young
And so ready to begin.
Welcome the year
Of the new millennium.

Chanukah of peace and hope
Harmony and love,
Happiness and dignity,
Blessings from above.

Can a child's song make it work?
Please pray that it will.
A brotherhood of joy,
A dream that is fulfilled.

Glowing candles shine
And hearts that really sing;
Consider what can happen
When we all want the same thing.

UJA Campaign 2000 Races Toward Close

The Chanukah tradition of spreading light to Jews in need is keeping UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 momentum going strong as the community-wide fundraising drive enters its final phase. The Campaign officially ends on December 31.

Campaign 2000 has passed the $30 million mark, two million dollars ahead of last year's early December total, thanks to contributions from 20,000 donors and gift increases averaging 7%.

The steady progress has been taking place amidst a flurry of activity including Outlook 2000, a Women's Campaign event featuring Dr. Alice Shalvi and a special pre-Raptors game reception held for UJA Federation campaigners.

"The response from the community has been amazing," says Abe Glowinsky, who is Vice-Chair of this year's UJA Federation campaign with Debbie Kimel and Howard Price. "But there's still a lot of work to be done to make sure our beneficiary agencies can provide those in need with the services they deserve."

UJA Federation's Outlook 2000 event featuring Mayor Mel Lastman drew a crowd of close to 400. (l-r) Bert Raphael Q.C., Morris Manning Q.C. and Harold Stein.

To that end, UJA Federation's final series of Answer the Call telethons will be held during Chanukah, December 5th, 7th and 8th. To register as a volunteer campaigner, please call (416) 635-2883 ext. 184. "Our volunteers tend to feel even more committed to the cause around this time of year," explains Rosanne Ain, who has been chairing Campaign 2000 telethons with Judy Engel and Dov Altman.

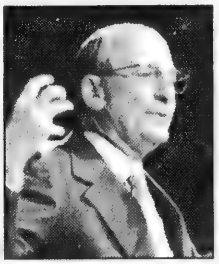
"Making calls is a wonderful way to celebrate Chanukah and help make miracles happen," adds Glowinsky.

But raising funds isn't the only way UJA Federation volunteers are marking the holidays. Dozens of Hands On Toronto (H.O.T) participants are pitching in to make sure some of the community's most vulnerable members partake in Chanukah celebrations. In partnership with Jewish Family and Child Service, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, H.O.T volunteers will be visiting three nursing homes, together with students from Greater Toronto Area Jewish day schools and over 150 JF&CS Chaplaincy Services volunteers.

"The seniors love interacting with younger people," says Lori Winch, who chairs H.O.T.'s nursing home program which has been helping run Chanukah parties for three years. "You can tell how much it means to them to know that people care."

H.O.T. volunteers will also be coordinating a Chanukah party at the Bathurst Jewish Centre for JF&CS Bigs and Littles clients. "It's our third year doing the Chanukah party and the volunteers now look as forward to the event as the kids do," explains Elyza Litwin, who chairs H.O.T.'s Bigs and Littles program.

GA Generates Great Reviews



United Jewish Communities Chair, Charles Bronfman speaking at the GA.

Toronto's Jewish community sent a 66-person delegation to this year's recent General Assembly (GA) of the United Jewish Communities-The Federations of North America, in Atlanta and virtually everyone considered the GA a valuable learning experience. Here's a sampling of community viewpoints.

"I learned about an impressive program in Miami, sponsored by the Jewish Federation, the Board of Rabbis and the synagogues, that offered free High holiday tickets to those who had not recently attended synagogue. That's something for us to look at."
Sandra Brown, Past President, UJA Federation

"I agree with the appraisal of Michael Steinhart (philanthropist and Birthright Israel co-founder) that communities should focus on young people from bar mitzvah age until marriage. That's something I think our community needs to do."
Janice Langer, President, Jewish Women's Federation

"The session sponsored by the Israel Democracy Institute was especially stimulating because it dealt with secular-religious relationships."
Joseph Steiner, Immediate Past President, UJA Federation

"Our whole existence as Jews is shared experience. Attending the GA allows us to share an experience to make our work in communal life much more meaningful."
Dov Altman, Co-chair, UJA Federation Telethon Steering Committee

Shalvi Shines

World renowned feminist, author and lecturer Dr. Alice Shalvi drew a crowd of over 300 when she recently spoke at a UJA Federation Women's Campaign sponsored event. Shalvi, known as Israel's mother of feminism, is shown here (middle) with event chairs Marlene Rochwerg (l) and Maura Cooperberg.

Judaism is a religion of redemption, says rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It will not take a miracle for the Messiah to come, says Rabbi Irving Greenberg, president of Chaverim Kol Israel, Jewish Life Network.

"In order to bring the Messiah, we need to have an upsurge of good; we have to restore the value of human life and overcome such things as poverty, oppression and sexism. If we can pull that off, there will be a Messiah."

Rabbi Greenberg was a speaker at the four-part Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture series being held at Holy Blossom Temple.

Judaism's central claim, he said, is that it is a religion of redemption. "We don't just teach that there is a God, but rather, because of God, the world has a goal, a direction and a good outcome."

Judaism has had more influence on the world than any other religion, he said. "That influence came out of the teaching of the redemption. The implication is that the world now is not a satisfactory place, but that there will be a happy ending."

We are living in a world that is moving from chaos to order, and from non-life to life, said Rabbi Greenberg. "We have to think in the long term. For billions of years, there was no life, and then there was an incredible profusion of life.

"There is a hidden power that sustains life; that power is God. If we just look at the surface, we will not see that life itself is, becoming more like God. The powers humans have are so developed, they are God-like," he said.

The climax of this process, he said, is the emergence of humans in the image of God. "Being in the image of God, means that, like God, the human life has infinite value. As well, every image of God is equal and unique. Human images cannot be replicated."

Torah insists we not settle for status quo

There is a contradiction however, because every person is not equal and valued, he said. "In our world, for instance, women are worth less than men."

Judaism teaches, though, not to accept the status quo, said Rabbi Greenberg. "Jewish tradition teaches that the status quo is not legitimate from a long-term point of view.

"We have a promise from God that the world will be perfect. Before we are done, there will be no hunger, no killing, no war."

The Torah insists that we not settle for the status quo, he said. "As soon as people [refuse to] settle for the status quo, there will be a revolution in our thinking."

Observing Shabbat, said Rabbi Greenberg, is one way of moving toward a perfect world. "When we observe Shabbat, we move out of the world [as we know it], and into a perfect world of peace, equality and justice – a world where there is nothing to do but think, grow and be.

"Once we experience Shabbat, we will not surrender to the idea of the status quo," he said.

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

מסעותי בארץ ישראל:

נסעתי לשבוע בתחילת חודש נובמבר. באוויר ריחפה המלחמה בין איר קנדה ואל על. לפחות חמישה ישראלים אמרו לי בניחוך: "אל-על מנסים, כמו שניסו עם טאוור אייר. יצליחו יצליחו. לא יצליחו לפחות ניסו". בינתיים הודיעה אל-על על סגירה התחנה במונטריאול, מה שמלמד עוד יותר את חומרת מצבה הכלכלי בקנדה.

בית אורן:

קיבוץ בית אורן שוכן בנקודה מדהימה ביופייה בלב הכרמל, וצופה על הים התיכון. זוהי "שוויצריה הקטנה" האמתית. רק טבעי שיבנו שם מלון קטן שיצפה על הים התיכון ועל היער. בנו הקיבוצניקים מלון חדש ויפה, עם חדרים בהחלט סבירים, ולובי שפונה לים. במונחים צפון אמריקניים , זהו מלון של שניים או שלושה כוכבים. ועכשיו מתחיל הקטע הקיבוצניקי. החניה של המלון משותפת לחצר של מטבח המלון ואתה יורד מן המכונית לקבלת פנים של עגלת אשפה גדולה וריחנית. החדרים עצמם- ריקים לחלוטין, אף ברושור, אף הסבר על שעות הארוחות ועל אטרקציות בקיבוץ או בסביבה. יש בחדר טלפון, אך אין שום הנחייה איך לחייג. ממש חדר קיבוצי כמו בימי ההכשרה והגרעין. כשיצאנו, הערתי על כך לפקידת הקבלה שנראתה לי כמו קיבוצניקית אכפתניקית. היא ניחכה ואמרה: "כן, כולם אומרים לנו את זה". סיפרתי את זה לחבר ישראלי והוא אמר: אתה מצחיק אותי! רוב התיירות שם היא תיירות פנים. הישראלי הממוצע לא מצפה לכלום מעל מה שהבטיחו לו. הבטיחו ארוחות, מגבות, שירותים . יש! בסדר. הוא שמח שלא צועקים עליו שם. הוא לא חושב שמגיע לו משהו כמו ברושור או הסבר. הוא כבר ימצא". ממש עצוב. אבל גם מתווה את הדרך הארוכה שצריך לעבור עדיין כדי להפוך את ישראל למדינה עם שירותים נורמאליים. המצחיק ועצוב בכל העניין, זה שבניית המלון עלתה לקיבוץ מליונים רבים. לעומת זאת להדפיס ברושור והוראות שימוש לטלפון ועוד דף כזה או אחר זה בערך אלף דולר. אבל שיישאר בינינו.

אהרון דהרי - מכתב:

"גידי קורן הנכבד.
קראתי את כתבתך בעניין ראש המשטרה נתניהו ואשתו. התעלמת מהעיקר. החקירה התחילה בעקבות עדות מר עמדי שבצע עבודות בשווי כ- 350 אלף ש"ח שמתוכם שולמו 50 אלף ש"ח ע"י המדינה. ואת השאר הוא תובע לפרוע.
בעקבות המשך החקירה מר עמדי העיד שהוא ביצע גם את עבודות האריזה ומחיקת הכתובות.
שכחת לציין שגם לאה רבין נחקרה בקשר לחשבון הדולרים, כ20- אלף שנשאר פתוח בארה"ב והיא שלמה קנס על כך. ובעלה יצחק רבין ז"ל התפטר מראשות הממשלה. כך שגם ללאה רבין העזו לעשות זאת.
התעלמת מהעיקר- העבודות שבוצעו במאות אלפי ש"ח ונבדקת השאלה באם היתה עבירה על חוקי המדינה.
בכבוד רב אהרון דהרי."
אהרון היקר: אין לי בעיה עם בירור המעשים. בעייתי העיקרית היא ההדלפות של המשטרה. גם נתניהו הוא אזרח, את פרטיותו יש לכבד, ועד שהוכחה אשמתו - זכאי הוא.

Marrus named to Vatican panel

1939 to 1945. The data was published between 1965 and 1981.

The historians will be free to raise relevant issues should they feel that they have not been satisfactorily resolved by existing documentation.

If questions still remain, they will seek further clarification, said Cardinal Edward Cassidy, president of the Vatican commission, and Seymour Reich, chair of the IJCIC.

"We will begin with published Vatican documents," said Marrus in an interview. "If there are further questions, we'll see. I'm for full public disclosure."

Marrus dismissed a comment by Lord Janner, a Jewish community official in Britain, that the historians' panel was, in effect, a waste of time because the Vatican had no intention of revealing "anything of value."

"When people are open to dialogue, they should be met halfway," said Marrus, a member of the Canadian War Museum's Holocaust advisory council and a member of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum's academic advisory committee.

Explaining that he had accepted the position because he sought "a deeper, richer historical understanding" of Vatican attitudes and policies in the period under review, Marrus denied he was being used by the Vatican in a public relations campaign.

"There has been extraordinary progress in Catholic-Jewish relations over the past 35 years, since Vatican II in the early 1960s, and that progress will continue," he said. "That's why exercises like this are worth undertaking."

Marrus pointed out that a sophisticated analysis of the Vatican can only be reached if historians gain access to its documents.

He disclosed that his fellow historians will meet in New York City early this month to discuss their mandate. A report will be issued, but Marrus does not know when.

His Jewish colleagues are Bernard Suchecky, research director at the Free University of Brussels in Belgium, and Robert Wistrich, professor of history at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Their Catholic counterparts are Eva Fleischner, author of Auschwitz: Beginning of a New Era? and professor emerita, Montclair State University, New Jersey; Gerald Fogarty, professor of religious studies at the University of Virginia; and John Morley, professor of Holocaust studies at Seton Hall University, New Jersey.

Marrus suggested that they will bring a balanced view to their deliberations.

By his estimate, a number of questions have yet to be answered regarding Vatican motivations and policies as it juggled humanitarian concerns with the need to safeguard its integrity.

Two of these questions are: To what extent did the Jewish issue register with the Holy See? How did the Vatican treat Jewish converts to Christianity during the Holocaust?

The Vatican's stance toward Jews, he said, can best be understood if it is compared to the way it responded to a host of other issues, ranging from the civil war in Spain to Italy's racial laws.

In The Holocaust in History, Marrus writes: "The Holy See turned a deaf ear to anguished calls from Polish bishops to denounce the Nazis' atrocities in Poland; issued no explicit call to stop the… euthanasia (program in Germany); deeply offended many by receiving the Croatian dictator Ante Pavelic, whose men butchered an estimated 700,000 Orthodox Serbs; and refused to denounce Italian aggression in Greece."

Historical context matters, observed Marrus.

The Vatican, he said, had an exaggerated view of its diplomatic clout and, like most Jewish leaders, underestimated the demonic power of Nazi Germany.

Asked what he thought of Cornwell's scalding biography, Marrus replied that, though flawed and "highly polemical," it nevertheless contained information of value.

In The Holocaust in History, Marrus offers a blistering appraisal of the Vatican under Pope Pius XII and his predecessor, Pope Pius XI.

The Vatican, he writes, quarrelled with both Hitler and Mussolini on race, "but hardly out of concern to Jews."

During the 1930s and 1940s, he adds, "the church seldom opposed anti-Jewish persecutions and rarely denounced governments for discriminatory practices; when it did so, it usually admonished governments to act with 'justice and charity,' disapproving only of violent excesses or the most extravagant forms of oppression."

Although Pope Pius XII was aware of the Holocaust, he refused to issue "explicit denunciations of the murder of Jews or call upon the Nazis directly to stop the killing."

Pius XII, Marrus says, hewed to a policy of neutrality and declined to associate himself with Allied declarations against Nazi war crimes.

The pope, he concludes, "remained reluctant to speak out almost until the very end."

Artist helps to restore Parliament Hill gates

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

WESTPORT, Ont. — The little town of Westport, not far from Perth, is an unlikely spot to find three artists producing Judaica.

Daniel Kerem, the son of retired Israeli consul Michael Kerem, settled in Westport 10 years ago, following his brother Raphael who had arrived seven years before him.

The brothers grew up in a small village in Israel inhabited mainly by Yemenite Jews.

Influenced by the work of the Yemenite silversmiths he knew as a child, Daniel decided to follow his artistic inclinations.

"When I decided to become a craftsman," he says, "I first took up carrying – the branch of smithing that shoes horses.

"After several years, I went to Germany and Austria and learned art smithing, making functional things such as doors and chandeliers out of brass, iron or bronze. I was there for about three years, but it is a lifelong endeavour, a vast science.

"I still go back every few years," he says.

The objects produced by Kerem cannot be considered modern art. Rather, he attempts to emulate the great masters of the late 15th and 16th centuries.

Kerem was recruited by a restoration company to replace approximately 3,000 damaged or missing parts of the Parliament Hill gates as part of a major restoration of the Parliament Buildings.

"These are the largest and most elaborate pieces of ironwork in Canada, Neo-Gothic in style," he says.

"The weather here is very hard on iron; the ice and snow in winter and humidity in summer. In winter, they get a constant spray of salt and melting snow. On top of that, tourists have picked off pieces for souvenirs."

Of the 3,000 pieces, the largest category was flowers made out of sheet metal in a gothic floral patterns.

"I had to take the original and make a template," says Kerem. "For quite a few, I had to make the tools. The challenge is to think like someone else and to come up with the same tool that was used before."

There were also hundreds of fasteners, such as bolts, to be created.

Kerem has recently presented a work of art to the Beth Israel synagogue in Kingston in memory of his late mother who died a year and a half ago.

The six-foot tall iron and brass chanukiyah was recreated in the style of the late 15th century.

"No chanukiyot of the medieval period have survived," he says. "This is based on drawings and research which I have done for many years."

Kerem's partner, Judith Forbes, who was initially a fashion designer, does medieval style embroidery, including biblical scenes and tallit bags.

His brother, Raphael, does woodwork and painting, also creating objects of Judaica.

"The whole family is committed to excellence in ancient craftsmanship," says Kerem, "and is trying to promote Jewish craftsmanship."

Every political leader wants to leave a legacy. At first, people thought Prime Minister Jean Chrétien would be satisfied with the semi-secular trinity: being the prime minister at the turn of the millennium, eliminating the deficit, and defeating the separatists in Quebec.

But Jean Chrétien, ever the fiery partisan, has a much more focused vision. He wants to be the Liberal leader that permanently establishes his party as the only federal option.

The calculation goes like this. Chrétien could retire and Paul Martin would be a shoo-in to replace him.

And almost as likely, Martin would win a third consecutive Liberal mandate. However, by then Martin would have been in or near the spotlight for more than a decade – about as long as Canadians can stomach any political leader.

Since he would never agree to step down after only one term as leader/prime minister, the Liberals would most assuredly go down to defeat the next time around.

The new scenario, however, would create an entirely new-fangled dynamic. Jean Chrétien sticks around and wins one more majority government (itself a record!).

He toys around for a year to 18 months and then gracefully steps aside to allow a whole new generation of leadership candidates to put a new and fresh face on the Liberal party.

Canadians would feel comfortable parking their votes with a "new and improved" version of the Liberal party and the cement establishing the Grits as the truly natural governing party will have had time to set.

When school children study modern Canadian history, this scenario guarantees that Jean Chrétien will stand apart from all others as the founder of a dynasty that renders the Big Blue Machine of Ontario as nothing greater than a student council election and the Duplessis years as little more than kinderspiel!

Despite the inherent cynicism of this script, its brilliance cannot be disputed. One strategy that obliterates all opposition – Paul Martin from within and the two-headed rightwing hydra of the Reform and Conservative parties from without.

The only element not factored into this equation is the needs of the people. But then again, from Chrétien's perspective, it may be that he thinks he is the people!

Bouchard, Parizeau launch libel suit

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Premier Lucien Bouchard and former premier Jacques Parizeau are suing for libel an investment counsellor, who more than six years ago, likened their political tactics to those of Adolf Hitler, in a confidential newsletter to his clients.

The separatist leaders are seeking $300,000 in damages from Richard Lafferty, a senior partner in the stock brokerage Lafferty, Harwood & Partners Ltd. The case is scheduled to be heard Dec. 6.

B'nai Brith Canada, which sharply denounced Lafferty's analogy at the time, has been asked by Bouchard and Parizeau's legal team to testify for them, but the organization says it will not do so voluntarily.

In early 1993, when ailing Liberal Robert Bourassa was still premier, and the defeat of the Charlottetown constitutional accord was fresh, the firm sent out a political analysis to its clients. The word "confidential" appears on top.

The newsletter was apparently leaked to Le Devoir, which ran a front-page story focusing on Lafferty's references to Hitler. Parizeau, who was then leader of the Parti Québécois, and Bouchard, then leader of the Bloc Québécois in Ottawa, filed their claim in court Feb. 22, 1993, arguing that the article was "incendiary, injurious, and defamatory."

The PQ, the newsletter stated, is "based on demoguery[sic] which has, as its fountain of political rhetoric, the dominating theme of nationalism," and nationalism is "the equivalent of tribalism and is amongst the most primitive forms of human society."

The key offending paragraph follows: "Jacques Parizeau, the leader of the [PQ] at the provincial level, and Lucien Bouchard, the leader of the [BQ] at the federal level, aim their appeal entirely at nationalism. It is a classic form of demoguery [sic] and is no different from what Hitler did, although Hitler at the time was operating in a greater political vacuum than that which presently prevails in Quebec or Canada, although with the financial pressures developing, both constituencies are coming into a political inoperative environment."

Both Bouchard and Parizeau objected to the comparison with Hitler.

Bouchard responded at the time: "This was absolutely unacceptable, almost surreal. I know that in politics there are some things which you have to accept, but you also have to draw the line."

Lafferty's lawyer, Mark Bantey, said the defence will be based on the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of expression.

"That guarantee exists not only to protect the opinions we agree with, but, more importantly, also those that we disagree with," Bantey said.

"The plaintiffs did not suffer any damages. No one is accusing Bouchard or Parizeau of advocating genocide, just that they are demagogues and that Hitler was one, too, and that they also use the tactics of fear."

Whether Lafferty's invoking the name of Hitler was appropriate, Bantey believes should not be matter for the courts to decide.

When the story was headlined in 1993, B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights issued a press release that "categorically rejected the analogy" Lafferty drew.

Stephen Scheinberg, League national chair at the time, added that the PQ and BQ are "not racists, not hatemongers, not murderers, not dictators. Adolf Hitler was."

Today however, Scheinberg says he finds it "curious" that Bouchard and Parizeau are resorting to suing for libel when they themselves "use their own words so loosely. It seems they can dish it out but they can't take it."

Scheinberg, a Concordia University history professor, said those in public life have to expect being attacked, even viciously, and that is especially true here in Quebec where an intense debate on the country's future has been going on for years.

"I still think the analogy was inappropriate, but I don't see it as a matter to be settled in the courts," Scheinberg said.

McGill University history professor Gil Troy, a member of the academic council of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research, says that as offensive as he may find careless comparisons to Hitler or the Holocaust, "I find it more offensive that government officials would use the power of the courts to squelch freedom of speech—any comment, let alone when the comments were confidential."

Lafferty's words have to be put into context, he thinks. Bouchard and Parizeau, he said, are controversial politicians and have resorted to provocative speech themselves. The arguments on all sides over the future of the province have been vigorous in tone, and rightly so, given the seriousness of what is at stake.

"A lawsuit has the effect of chilling the atmosphere, and that is very dangerous," Troy said.

TORONTO — "I've prepared absolutely nothing," Mordecai Richler said from behind the podium. "So if you have some questions, I will answer them. Otherwise, we can all go to lunch."

Mordecai Richler speaks to U of T students during a question and answer session he hosted on Nov. 18. [Gregory Levey photo]

Richler, author of Barney's Version, as well as such classics as The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, Oh Canada! Oh Quebec!, and Jacob Two-Two Meets the Hooded Fang, was speaking at an informal question and answer period held recently at the University of Toronto.

The forum, sponsored by the U of T Jewish Student Union, the English Student Union, and Trinity College, drew some 60 students. The questions posed ranged from those about his work to those about the future of Quebec.

"When did you decide to become a writer?" was the first question from the audience.

"Very early on," Richler replied. "I've never had a real job. I dropped out of university when I was 19 to go to Paris, and I've never done anything else."

Asked about his inspiration for writing, he quipped that he only had to "go through his bills." He cannot wait for inspiration, he told the gathering. He just has to "get to work" each day to do his three hours of writing.

"What happens after the three hours?" someone asked, and the audience laughed. Richler responded, "I have lunch, go for a walk, read, or have a few drinks."

When asked about his thoughts on Toronto, he said that the city was far more sophisticated than 30 years ago, when it was still a "closed Presbyterian fest."

However, he said he still prefers life in Montreal, even though it is a "diminished city."

In response to a statement that some of his books have an anti-Semitic tone, Richler said that he had once been confronted by a Jewish man who said to him, "Everything you wrote in Duddy Kravitz was true, but why couldn't you give him an Italian name?"

His only responsibility, Richler told the students, is "to be true to his craft and as honest as possible." He said that he writes about "people as they are, not as he wants them to be."

Asked by one student what to make of teachers and professors who read too deeply into books, Richler said, "Tell them to leave you alone."

While answering a question about Quebec nationalism, which he said was rooted in anti-Semitism, he suddenly took out a cigarillo and lit it.

Casually smoking the little cigar, he said that "to say that Bouchard is anti-Semitic is wrong," but he felt that the premier harbours resentment towards the Jewish community because Quebec Jews have sided with English Montreal.

Someone in the audience asked if Richler had thought of going into politics.

Exhaling smoke through his nose, he answered simply and with a smile, "No."

The last questions were about Israel, and Richler told the audience that he had been there twice. He said that he was much more hopeful about the country's prospects now than when Benjamin Netanyahu was in office.

The only solution to Israel's problems, he said, was a Palestinian State. He added that the "haredim have too much influence for their numbers," and that while Jews outside of Israel depend on a separation of church and state, in Israel they are "too dangerously intertwined."

"OK," he said after the hour was over. "I think I'm done. Thank you very much."

When he left, the room emptied quickly, but the smell of smoke lingered on for a while.

New hope for arthritis sufferers

By DIANE KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — A new drug has brought about a dramatic improvement in the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis, recent studies show.

The results of a number of studies presented at the 63rd Annual Scientific Meeting of the American College of Rheumatology in Boston indicate that the release of the drug Enbrel (etanercept) has significantly changed the lives of patients in the United States. It will soon be available in Canada.

The only drug therapy to be approved in the United States for the treatment of both adult and juvenile rheumatoid arthritis, Enbrel "has had a very consistent profile," says Dr. Barbara Finck of Seattle. "It has revolutionized the care of arthritis patients" in the year since its U.S. launch.

"New data shows that it actually prevents the progression of disease," Finck says. "The early results are incredible. [It has] changed the course of the disease and changed the face of rheumatology."

Enbrel must be administered by injection twice a week. "Patients like the autonomy of being able to take Enbrel themselves," Finck says.

To date, the only significant complications from the drug have been injection-site inflammation or infection.

When it is released, however, the cost will inhibit many patients. It is estimated that the cost of the drug, for each patient, will be approximately $1,600 (Cdn) per month.

This is of great concern to physicians. "Enbrel is a very good, effective drug and offers patients an opportunity to get the best results available," but the cost is "a big, big, big problem," says Dr. Rachel Shupak of Toronto.

Dr. Leo Picard of Moncton, N.B., agrees. "I have at least 20 patients who could benefit from it, but it is not available because it is too expensive," he says.

Other new drugs recently released in Canada are Celebrex (celcoxib) and Vioxx (rofecoxib).

Alan Gibson, of Merck Frosst Canada, says the release of Vioxx this week is a proud moment for Canadians.

The drug was developed in Montreal by Dr. Robert Young, head of the Department of Research at the Merck Frosst Centre for Therapeutics.

"We are a small country to develop an international product," says Gibson.

Vioxx is taken orally, and is far less expensive than either Celebrex (which cannot be taken by anyone with an allergy to sulfa) or Enbrel, and it is safe for the stomach, he says.

Picard is looking forward to using the new drugs which, he says, "are not better [than traditional, anti-inflammatory drugs], but are safer. I have patients who have died because of anti-inflammatory drugs, so Celebrex and Vioxx will be welcome." (Traditional anti-inflammatory drugs have a number of possible side effects and may affect the intestines.)

"Vioxx and Enbrel are new drugs that will help a lot of people, especially those with stomach problems," says Dr. Jacob Karsh of Ottawa.

"There are many people suffering from ulcers, and this will be a big help. These are two very important new drugs that offer hope to rheumatologists as much as to patients."

Israeli-Vatican tensions increase

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Israel's attempt to defuse a Christian-Muslim conflict in Nazareth has soured its relations with the Vatican and called into question a visit to the town by the pope during his millennium pilgrimage to the Holy Land next March.

Nazareth is revered by Christians as the childhood home of Jesus, but today it is Israel's largest Arab town and some 60 percent of its 65,000 residents are Muslim.

The conflict centres on plans to construct a mosque in Nazareth near the Basilica of the Annunciation, believed by Christians to be the spot where the archangel Gabriel announced to Mary that she would bear the son of God.

Israel granted the go-ahead for the mosque after two years of mounting tensions and violent clashes over the issue between local Christians and Muslims.

Muslims laid the cornerstone for the mosque on Nov. 23, although Israeli sources said actual construction would not begin until 2001.

Churches throughout the Holy Land shut their doors for two days, Nov. 22 and 23, in protest, and the Vatican lashed out at Israel for allowing construction.

"The decision of the Israeli government seems to lay the groundwork for future contrasts and tensions between the two religious communities, Christian and Islamic," the Vatican's chief spokesman, Joaquin Navarro-Valls, said in an unusually strongly worded statement that coincided with the laying of the mosque's cornerstone.

"I believe that political authorities in this case have a great responsibility, because instead of favouring unity, they create the foundation to foment division," he said.

Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy reacted strongly to the Vatican's criticism.

The Vatican statement, he told Israel Radio, is "very grave," adding, "We reject it."

The Anti-Defamation League, too, took the Vatican to task. In a statement, it said it was "shocked and saddened at the Vatican pronouncements laying blame on Israel for tensions between Muslims and Christians in Nazareth."

The statement said that while both sides may not be satisfied, "no one should question Israel's good faith efforts in this matter."

The conflict erupted two years ago, when municipal authorities in Nazareth unveiled plans to build a large plaza near the Basilica of the Annunciation to accommodate the millions of pilgrims expected during the year 2000 – a Holy Year for the Catholic Church.

Local Muslims protested this plan, saying the planned plaza would damage the tomb of Shehab el-Din, nephew of the 12th-century Muslim hero, Saladin. They set up an illegal protest tent and demanded that a mosque be built. Violent clashes over the issue erupted last spring.

The Israeli government was forced to step in and take action after local authorities failed to agree on a solution and the conflict spread to involve broader Christian and Muslim interests. Each side put pressure on the government and accused the other side of using threats.

Jerusalem's Higher Islamic Committee and the Palestinian Authority opposed the construction of the mosque, and Yasser Arafat even sent emissaries who tried, unsuccessfully, to mediate.

On Friday, Israel's ambassador to the Vatican, Aharon Lopez, told reporters that Israel's decision to allow construction of the mosque is an attempt to reach a compromise and avoid bloodshed.

"If there was any purpose to the government decision, it was the opposite of fomenting division," he said.

Lopez said the issue had been blown out of proportion, and that the mosque would not encroach on Christian property nor hinder access to the Basilica.

Most of the plaza intended for pilgrims would remain open, he said, and the mosque itself would be much smaller than Muslims had demanded originally.

The Vatican announced Nov. 18 that Pope John Paul II would fulfil his long-held dream and make a pilgrimage to biblical sites in the Holy Land in the last 10 days of March.

Sources said the pope might skip Nazareth if the situation remains tense.

KOSHER DIETARY LAWS OBSERVED

Rome Jews concerned

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Authorities have stepped up surveillance at public locations that are considered potential targets for anti-Semitic attacks, following two bombing incidents linked to neo-Nazis.

Security was also increased last Sunday at soccer stadiums, where extremist fans often wave banners with anti-Semitic slogans.

Last week, on Tuesday night, a rudimentary bomb damaged the entrance to Rome's Liberation Museum, which is dedicated to the World War II Resistance movement.

Three days later, police defused a similar homemade bomb planted at the entrance of a Rome movie theatre, just around the corner from Parliament. The cinema had presented a special screening of a documentary on Adolf Eichmann, A Specialist – Portrait of a Modern Criminal, made by Israeli director Eyal Sivan.

Anonymous callers saying they represent a group called the Anti-Zionist Movement claimed responsibility for both bombs. Police said they had not known of the group before.

No one was injured in either incident, but the two events rang alarm bells among both political and Jewish community leaders, and focused attention on neo-Nazi skinhead and other right-wing extremist groups, as well as on soccer hooligans.

"This concerns not only us Jews, but all civil and democratic forces in the country," said Amos Luzzatto, president of the Italian Jewish community. He urged that authorities halt play in soccer games where fans are seen displaying racist or anti-Semitic banners.

Politicians from all parts of the political spectrum condemned the recent attacks and warned of possible further incidents.

Even before police discovered the bomb at the Nuovo Olimpia movie theatre, Interior Minister Rosa Russo Jervolino said, "The government does not consider the bomb [at the museum] as an isolated event, but considers it to be part of a neo-Nazi, anti-Semitic strategy."

The cinema had hosted a gala preview screening Tuesday night of the film about the 1961 Eichmann trial in Jerusalem. Rome's Chief Rabbi Elio Toaff and other dignitaries had attended.

Police last weekend interrogated dozens of youths known to belong to skinhead and other extremist groups, including militant soccer fan clubs.

Maurizio Boccacci, Rome's most notorious right-wing extremist leader, denied involvement in the bombings but said he supported the actions.

Reports said the homemade bombs resembled explosive devices set off in the stands by militant soccer fans during matches.

"The racist tension in the stadiums, as it is tolerated, has created an incubator for the bombs which some people still prefer to call 'firecrackers,'" said Claudio Fano, former president of the Rome Jewish community. "The soccer world is an accomplice in all this."

Jewish leaders have been trying for years to get soccer authorities to crack down on racist and anti-Semitic slogans used by militant fans, to little avail.

Hard-line fans often use anti-Semitic slogans to direct abuse against rival teams.

The Week in Israel

Nov 22

• Israeli police arrested a newspaper publisher who has been under investigation for allegedly plotting to have two rival publishers and a detective killed. The charges against Ofer Nimrodi, publisher of the daily Ma'ariv, were not specified.

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak said the Palestinians could issue their own currency as part of a final peace settlement.

Nov 23

• The Palestinian Authority presented Israel with a report on the confiscation by its security forces of dozens of illegal weapons and explosives.

• Jewish settlers voluntarily abandoned a West Bank enclave they staked out overnight. The move came after Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh warned they could be evicted forcibly.

Nov. 24

• Israel criticized a sharply worded Vatican statement that allowing construction of a mosque near the main Christian shrine in Nazareth was intended to aggravate tensions between Muslims and Christians.

• An Israeli cabinet minister said he would support legislation by an Arab Knesset member to remove the PLO and Fatah from a list of terrorist organizations. Haim Ramon said it is illogical for the group to continue to be included on the list in light of the Oslo accords.

Nov. 25

• Israel's High Court of Justice ordered the release of six Iraqi nationals who have been jailed without trial for more than six years. The court rejected the argument of security forces that at least three of the Iraqis were dispatched to Israel to spy on the Jewish state.

Nov. 26

• Li Peng, a former prime minister of China and now the number two official in the Chinese Communist Party, arrived in Israel for a six-day visit. He began with a tour of Kibbutz Zora to examine Israel's agricultural technology.

Peace with Syria still uncertain

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Ehud Barak is fond of saying that he and Hafez Assad could wrap up the terms of a peace treaty if only they could have a face-to-face meeting. Wishful thinking though it may be,

Mideast Analysis

Barak's observation is probably a function of frustration. Five months after succeeding Benjamin Netanyahu as prime minister, Barak has been unable to coax Syria into resuming direct negotiations with Israel.

And although reports suggest that Israel and Syria have conducted secret discussions via an unnamed third party, there are no concrete signs as yet that a renewal of face-to-face talks is imminent. If anything, there is less cause for optimism today than last summer, when Barak and Assad complemented each other through the media and a resumption of talks seemed inevitable.

The situation these days is such that Barak and Assad cannot even agree on the conditions for restarting negotiations. They were suspended by Israel in the winter of 1996 after Syria declined to send condolences following a series of Palestinian suicide attacks which claimed the lives of 60 civilians in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Syria insists that talks must resume from the point where they were broken off. Israel has, in theory, accepted this formula, but Barak and Assad disagree where in fact the negotiations ended. This is not merely a procedural problem, but a substantive issue of great importance which may yet wreck any opportunity for an historic rapprochement.

Syria contends that Yitzhak Rabin, as well as Shimon Peres, promised to withdraw to the June 4, 1967 lines on the Golan Heights, and that President Bill Clinton confirmed this pledge in writing in June 1995. Future negotiations, the Syrians say, should be based on this approach.

Israel maintains that no such pledge was made. By Israel's account, Rabin, through the good offices of the United States, hypothetically asked Assad in 1993 what concessions he would make if Israel agreed to return to the June 1967 lines. This is now a moot matter, however, because Barak opposes a withdrawal that would give the Syrians a foothold perilously close to the eastern shores of the Sea of Galilee.

Barak, though, is amenable to "very painful concessions" on the Golan, provided that other key issues can be settled. He appears to be ready to withdraw to the 1923 international line, under which Israel would retain the lower slopes of the Golan, water resources there, and the land around the Sea of Galilee.

Syria is holding out for the maximum – the June 1967 lines, which encompass the pre-Six Day War demilitarized zones. These enclaves, consisting of 66 square miles, were established in the wake of Syria's seizure of territory west of the international line during the 1948 Arab-Israeli war. By all accounts, Syria is now trying to place these demilitarized zones on the table again, a position Israel rejects.

Apart from this disagreement, the two sides remain deadlocked over another integral question. Syria wants a prior commitment from Israel that it will give up the Golan in its entirety, but Israel is resisting this demand. The depth of Israel's withdrawal depends on the depth of peace, Barak has said. Israel's foreign minister, David Levy, contends that negotiations should be opened "without preconditions," a stance Syria contemptuously dismisses.

As a result of these fundamental differences, Israel and Syria are, once again, bogged down in a bitter war of words. Last week, Syria accused Israel of "blocking the path to a just and honorable peace." Israel, for its part, accuses Syria of being unreasonable.

Further dimming the picture is the health of Syria's top two decision makers. Assad is said to be ailing and reportedly is not always alert, while his foreign minister, Farouk al-Shaara, is still recovering from heart surgery.

The United States, meanwhile, awaits Assad's reply to a list of questions on security arrangements and normalization Barak and Clinton put to Shaara last September. Clearly, no diplomatic breakthroughs are in the offing. On the Syrian front, progress is glacial.

Ron Bolotin: Sheer Determination

Five days before Ron Bolotin's 19th birthday, while on training exercises in the Sinai, he stepped on a land mine. Ron lost his right leg and his eyes were so severely damaged, he feared he would never see again. But luck was on his side — the surgeons saved his sight, and he was fitted with a prosthesis to replace his right leg.

Before joining the army, Ron's passion was competitive swimming. Six months after receiving his prosthesis, he was ready to enter the water again. He trained at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv, and with the help of the highly specialized rehabilitation staff, he became a swimming instructor for disabled children.

In the summer of 1976 — less than a year after his horrific injury, Ron won the Israeli Championship for disabled swimmers. In 1979 he won the European Championship. Since then, he has won many medals all over the world.

In 1990 he married Miri Omer, his swimming instructor. Although he retired from competitive swimming in 1992, he still attends the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv, instructing other disabled veterans.

He says he could have never returned to a normal life, had it not been for the outstanding help he received at the Beit Halochem Centre. "Beit Halochem is my lifeline; there's no question about that."

The other 48,000 disabled veterans also have the DETERMINATION to reach their potential.

Community leaders, students network at GA

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

ATLANTA, Ga. — What's a guy who deals with endowments and bequests doing attending spirituality sessions at the General Assembly?

Dov Harris, director of planned giving at UIA Federations Canada, asked that question rhetorically, reflecting on why he's drawn to the Jewish Renaissance and Renewal theme that has become one of the four areas of focus, or "pillars," for Jewish communities in North America.

For Harris, who became aware of a new focus on Jewish learning at the annual GA about five years ago, Jewish values are instrinsically linked with his work.

He's not alone. "Renaissance" has become the latest buzzword in the organized Jewish community: In fact, the opening Renaissance forum at the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities, held recently in Atlanta, drew the largest attendance of any of the four focus sessions.

The others were campaign/finance resource development, human services and social policy, and Israel and overseas.

United Jewish Communities (UJC), which became a legal entity at this year's GA, was formed as a merger of three American organizations: United Jewish Appeal, the Council of Jewish Federations and United Israel Appeal of America.

The UJC represents 189 North American federations and 400 unfederated Jewish communities.

All Canadian federations are members of UJC through their ties with UIA Federations Canada.

Canadian federations are actually "much tighter" than their American counterparts because of UIA Federations Canada, said Joel Miller, executive director of the Calgary Jewish Community Council.

"[In Canada] you can get all ten federated communities sitting around the table. Collective national responsibility was a Canadian thing long before it was an American thing," he said.

The UJC merger is "long overdue," according to Malcolm Weinstein, a past president of Vancouver's federation, who works professionally in the area of organizational change.

"The organizations have been struggling over turf and territory and scarce professional resources, and spending a lot of money that could be spent in a single organization," he said.

Weinstein expects it will take about five years before the UJC becomes truly federation-owned, as is being touted. "They're working on it."

Montrealer Harvey Wolfe, immediate past president of UIA Federations Canada, is a veteran of the system, having attended 27 GAs.

This year's event – which ran from Nov. 17 to 20 and attracted over 5,000 delegates, including about 150 Canadians – was "excellent, in that it targeted the general attendance. You didn't have to be all that knowledgeable to enjoy the program," he said.

A couple of other community leaders told The CJN privately that the agenda lacked depth, but Wolfe believes many of the sessions were directed at the younger generation rather than his own peers.

"We [the older generation] network, we talk business," Wolfe said. The conference also provides an opportunity to meet with Jewish community leaders from Israel, he added.

"Even if you come away with one or two ideas, it's enough to keep you focusing and sort of propelled for the next year," said Lorraine Sandler, who will lead this year's Toronto contingent for March of the Living.

Arts major Lisa Rubin, a 22-year-old Montrealer, said the GA sparked her interest in politics. She felt "comfortable" and "inspired."

The presence of 225 North American students – among them at least 60 Canadians, mostly from Toronto and Montreal – represents the "future of the community and the future of the Jewish people," said Jay Rubin, executive vice-president of Hillel, The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

'Future of the Jewish people'

The students also networked with speakers, delegates and potential employers.

Justin Korda of Montreal called Ariel Sharon, leader of Israel's opposition Likud party, and arranged a private meeting with him for a group of students.

Hillel has been sending students to the GA for the past decade. "In the '60s, noted Rubin, they had to fight their way in.

For first-timers, the GA could be overwhelming, with a staggering choice of sessions – over three dozen in an average day.

Among the speakers were numerous community leaders and luminaries of the Jewish world, including Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak, whose scheduled live talk was changed to a satellite appearance after his plane was damaged in England. (see CJN, Nov. 25)

But probably, the speaker who struck the most resonant chord – or at least one of the most resonant – was Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israel's minister for Israeli Society and World Jewish Communities, who directly addressed the issue of pluralism, and reinforced the concept of Jewish unity, an underlying theme of the GA.

Rabbi Michael Melchior

The Danish-born rabbi, whose manner reflects both dignity and affability, said in an address at the opening plenary that he often "longed for the multi-faceted Jewish life in Scandinavia" after making aliyah with his family in 1986.

Referring to the homogeneity of his own Orthodox community in Israel, the rabbi said, "I often think that is a little sad. I did not realize that it could also be dangerous."

The assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin by an Orthodox student was a turning point for Rabbi Melchior, who assumed the leadership of Meimad – an organization of moderate Orthodox rabbis in Israel – to show that there is no contradiction between Judaism and democracy, modernity, peace or justice, he said.

He invited the North American delegates to "consider my office your representation around the table of the Israeli cabinet."

Richard Chartash of downtown Toronto's Danforth Jewish Circle said Melchior's talk, and his inclusive approach, provided "a tremendous boost." The Danforth Jewish Circle receives grant money through the New York-based Jewish Outreach Institute, a group involved with research on unaffiliated and intermarried Jews.

Several others said they were "blown away" by Rabbi Melchior's talk. The rabbi himself said at a press conference he was "quite overwhelmed" by the response. "I didn't say anything except what I believe."

While he left the GA encouraged by the "will to work together," Rabbi Melchior expressed concern about a lack of desire on the part of young people to enter the rabbinate or the field of Jewish education.

"We have to work together to turn it into the in thing... That has to express itself in the salaries and the place in society we give our teachers."

Other issues with which Rabbi Melchior is dealing include conversion, and nascent religious dialogue with Islamic leaders over the peace process – a key, he believes, to successful resolution.

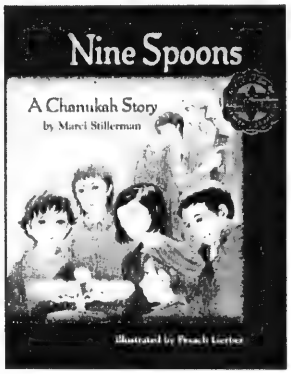
Great Chanukah books...

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Chanukah is most people's favourite holiday. Latkes, jelly doughnuts, presents, parties, and, most of all, the beautiful menorah, with its brightly shining candles – it all seems just about perfect.

This time of year, though, always makes us remember times past, when things were not always as wonderful.

In By the Hanukkah Light, by Sheldon Oberman, illustrated by Neil Waldman (Boyd Mills Press, 1997), Grandpa tells his grandchildren about Chanukah when he was a boy. In a lot of ways, the holiday was just as much fun as their Chanukah. The family ate latkes, sang, spun dreidels and gave the children Chanukah gelt. But there was one big difference.



The Chanukah menorah was lit behind drawn curtains. A truly evil man, Adolf Hitler, had come with soldiers to destroy the Jews.

"We were afraid to put our Hanukkiah in the window, afraid to bless it and light it, afraid someone would see it and say we were Jews," Grandpa explains.

Luckily, the family was able to leave Europe, leaving everything behind – even the menorah.

Years later, Grandpa became a soldier in the army that defeated Hitler. He returned to his home town, and cried over everything that was gone. Everything but one thing. Can you guess what that was?

The grandmother in Nine Spoons, by Marci Stillerman, illustrated by Pesach Gerber (Hachai Publishing, 1998), also tells about Chanukah when she was a young girl. But her story is about one very special Chanukah.

She was in a concentration camp, a terrible place where the Nazis put Jews during World War II. Life was very hard there. They were always cold, always hungry, always tired. Yet, in spite of everything, the women decided that the children should have a menorah.

One of the women, Raizel, had been an artist. She promised that if people would bring her nine spoons, she would make a menorah.

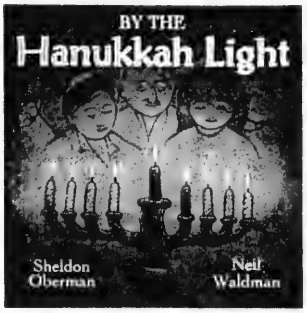
That may sound like a simple thing, but in the concentration camp, the people were given one spoon when they arrived, and that was that. If they lost it, they could not get another one, and they would have no way to eat.

Yet, somehow, Raizel got nine spoons and fashioned a beautiful menorah. And that year, the children of the camp celebrated Chanukah.

Nine Spoons is a beautiful book, that tells a wonderful story of hope and caring and miracles. In fact, it won the Sydney Taylor Award of the Association of Jewish Libraries, a very important award.

You will enjoy both By the Hanukkah Light and Nine Spoons very much. You might ask your family, your grandparents, parents and aunts and uncles what Chanukah was like when they were growing up. You might be very surprised.

By the way, Sheldon Oberman, who wrote By the Hanukkah Light, also wrote a wonderful book called The Always Prayer Shawl, about a tallit that was passed down through the generations. If you haven't read that book, try to get it.



...and some new CDs

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

One of the best things about Chanukah is the singing. You will really enjoy two new CDs that have just come out.

Paul Zim has a wonderful new Chanukah CD, Chanukah Is Tops! It is a mixture of traditional songs like S'Vivon and Maoz Tzur, songs that Zim wrote especially for the CD, and others where he thought up new words and tunes for familiar songs.

The Singing Dreidelettes are back, too, to make this CD really special. You can also get Chanukah is Tops on cassette.

Temple Har Zion in Thornhill was the birthplace of Chanukah With a Twist, by Eleanor, Dawn and Dr. Dave. It features new lyrics for familiar songs, and Chanukah lyrics set to ordinary music. Elvis Presley's You Ain't Nothing but a Hound Dog has become You Ain't Nothing But a Dreydel and I've Been Working on the Railroad has become I've Been Searching for Some Oil.

There is also a rap, a horah, and a march.

A musical journey through Jewish history

By CAROLAN HALPERN
CJN Staff

Roots and Wings, a concert by the Toronto Children's Chorus and their guests, the Syracuse Children's Chorus, provided a journey through Jewish history.

The choirs carried the audience from freedom, through despair in the valley of the shadow of death, to hope, ending with a message of peace for today's world.

Their vehicle was music by North American Jewish composers.

The concert, which was held recently at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, began with a new work, the North American premiere of Srul Irving Glick's Psalm Trilogy, and concluded with familiar medleys by George Gershwin and Aaron Copland, whose 99th birthday was the day of the concert.

Psalm Trilogy, a libretto in Hebrew and in English, created from the text of three psalms, was commissioned by Ian Epstein and his wife, Kathy Kacer, to honour the bat mitzvah of their daughter Gabi, a member of the Toronto Children's Chorus.

The trilogy began with seven choristers walking through the halls of Beth Tikvah, each holding a lit Shabbat candle and singing, "Mizmor shir l'yom Shabbat." (Let us sing a song for the Sabbath day.)

Combined choirs were 200 young voices

"The seven candles are for the seven days of creation," said Jennie Morgan, 14, a member of the Toronto chorus.

The combined choirs, some 200 young voices, accompanied by a small string orchestra comprised of Toronto Symphony Orchestra musicians, took up the theme, affirming the roots of Judaism – honouring the Sabbath and praising the greatness of God.

The music, especially for the 23rd Psalm, "was peaceful, calming," reflecting what the psalms were about, said Heather Wilkie, also 13, and a choir member.

The Syracuse Children's Chorus then sang of the Jewish people's redemption from slavery in V'Higad'ta l'vincha (And you shall tell your children), by American composer Gerald Cohen.

"Avadim Hayinu – We were slaves unto Pharaoh in Egypt, and HaShem brought us forth with a mighty hand," the piece begins.

But the Jewish journey to freedom was not peaceful, and centuries of persecution ultimately led to the Holocaust.

The Toronto Children's Chorus alternately sang and recited poetry from I Never Saw Another Butterfly, poems written by children interned at Terezin.

The narration and the oboe accompaniment by Gillian Howard served as a counterpoint to the music, emphasizing the disorientation of the children in the concentration camp.

Jennie, who was one of the narrators, said doing the narration was more moving than singing, because "I was doing it alone, not with the whole choir." She felt this gave her a responsibility to express the emotion of the poetry.

Heather, who is not Jewish, said the Holocaust "is part of everybody's history. It affected everybody."

The music for I Never Saw Another Butterfly was "like the children's lives – cut short," Heather said, pointing out that several of the pieces end abruptly.

Parts of the piece "are dissonant," Jennie said, "which adds to the effect."

Liberty Heights deals with Jewish issues

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Barry Levinson, in Liberty Heights, returns to a perennial topic – his youth in Baltimore. Judging by three of his previous films, notably Diner, Tin Men and Avalon, Levinson has practically made a career out of conjuring up gauzy memories of his adolescence.

In these movies, he touched on his Jewishness rather glancingly. But in Liberty Heights, which opens here next week, he deals with the issue head on. Indeed, the film is suffused with Levinson's remembrances of things Jewish.

Liberty Heights, which takes its name from a Jewish neighbourhood in which Levinson was raised, is set in 1954 and 1955, at a time when American society was in transition. It was a period when sharp religious, race and class distinctions were on the cusp of eroding.

But even as these changes were gradually taking hold and inexorably transforming attitudes and opinions, Levinson's old neighbourhood seemed impervious to change.

As the film opens, Ben Kurtzman, the central character, sets the stage with a nostalgic voiceover. Viewing America through the narrow prism of his home turf, Ben (Ben Foster) intones that "the whole world" appeared to be Jewish.

This is followed by two amusing scenes which establish Ben's Jewish heritage, as well as the Jewish character of Liberty Heights. In the first, young Ben is aghast when a non-Jewish friend's mother plops a plain white, untoasted sandwich on the kitchen table. In the second, a teacher takes attendance, calling out a succession of Cohens without batting an eyelash.

And in a nod to Ben's father's level of religiosity, Levinson sets up a revealing scene in which Nate Kurtzman (Joe Mantegna), a sleazy businessman, sneaks out of synagogue on Rosh Hashanah to inspect

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

A SPIRITUAL GUIDEBOOK TO ISRAEL

Most travel guidebooks focus upon some part of the external, physical world. As a traveller, I've relied upon scores of guidebooks to enhance my understanding of scores of localities. But one book I came across recently seems distinctly different than most of the others.

What sets Israel: A Spiritual Travel Guide apart? Largely, it's the orientation of its author, Rabbi Lawrence A. Hoffman, whose focus is the inner, spiritual world of the traveller rather than the outer, physical world through which the traveller moves.

The book isn't an encyclopedia of information about religious sites, as one might expect. Rather, it's a handbook for the religiously inclined to experience the Promised Land as spiritual pilgrims.

The author notes, for instance, that Jewish pilgrims in previous centuries reached Jerusalem "only after trekking through the wilderness first, not at all unlike the Israelites who journeyed from Egypt."

By comparison, he says, the quick flight and taxi-ride from Ben Gurion Airport that puts us in the heart of Jerusalem can undercut our appreciation of the Holy City.

"Before plane travel ... Jerusalem (was) the end of the journey, not the beginning," he writes. "We lose something by starting out where we really ought to end up."

Hoffman's recipe for getting the most from a trip to Israel is "Anticipate, Approach, Acknowledge. Afterthought." He provides readings, prayers, poems, psalms, meditations and blessings to put the traveller in the correct frame of mind to "Know Before Whom (or What) You Are Standing."

Localities treated include Deganya, the Jezreel Valley, Safed, the Dead Sea, Sodom, Ein Gedi, Masad, the Allenby Bridge, the Jaffa Gate, Har Herzl, the Knesset, the Kotel, Temple Mount, Mount Scopus, Hebron, Bethlehem, Haifa, Beit Hat'futsot (Tel Aviv) and Mount Nebo (Jordan).

Published by Jewish Lights Publishing, Vermont, and available in select bookstores. 802-457-4000.

Algonquin Reveries: Tucked into the urban streetscape of W. 44th St. in Manhattan, the Algonquin Hotel has been graced in recent years by the addition of a historic brass plaque to its exterior.

The plaque explains that in its heyday in the 1920s the hotel was home to the famed Round Table, and thus a favoured watering hole for the likes of Dorothy Parker, Robert Benchley, Alexander Woollcott, Robert Sherwood, Edna Ferber, Harold Ross, Harpo Marx and George S. Kaufman.

Because I admire the works of many of these personalities, I've always been attracted to The Algonquin. It's still a haunt for less-established writers, who come for a weekend stay (or at least drinks with live entertainment in the Oak Room) in hopes of becoming witty or famous by osmosis.

Oh, well: at least the hotel is quiet, clean, and has a convenient midtown location. Also, its wallpaper, which features clever cartoons from The New Yorker, keeps one happily amused while waiting for an elevator.

Despite its grand reputation, the Algonquin, it must be said, is not a grand hotel. It's built on a human scale and has only two elevators. Its rooms and corridors are of modest dimensions.

Still, as Dorothy Parker famously quipped one rainy afternoon, it was her favourite place to "get out of my wet things and into a dry martini." It's a place with great character, and even a lobby cat. 59 W. 44th St. (212) 840-6800.

Film filled with good intentions

the latest model Cadillac in a showroom.

Liberty Heights turns on three separate but ultimately related dramas which affect Ben, his brother Van (Adrien Brody) and their father: Ben's platonic fling with Sylvia (Rebekah Johnson), the only black girl in his newly-desegregated high school; Van's infatuation with a Christian girl, the blonde, beautiful, preppy Dubbie (Carolyn Murphy); and Nate's uneasy and disastrous relationship with Little Melvin (Orlando Jones), an anti-Semitic black drug dealer given to mouthing the loathsome phrase, "Are you trying to Jew me out of my money?"

As Levinson demonstrates, Baltimore in the mid-1950s was rife with covert anti-Semitism and racial stereotypes.

When Ben and his friends intrude upon an exclusive country club, they bump into a sign that reads "No Jews, Dogs or Coloreds Allowed."

At a Halloween party, one of Van's companions touches off a fist fight when he is pointedly asked whether he is Jewish.

This touchiness about being Jewish can lead to self-hatred, as when Yussel (David Krumholtz), Van's college friend, dyes his hair blond, anglicizes his name on the fly and passes himself off as a Scandinavian.

Clearly, Liberty Heights has a knack for recreating the racial animus which pervaded Baltimore 45 years ago. To cite but two examples: Ben's mother (Bebe Neuwirth) is less than thrilled by his harmless dalliance with the demure Sylvia, while Sylvia's father, a wealthy doctor, forbids her to date white boys, claiming it is unrespectable.

Levinson's portrait of racially divided Baltimore is sociologically sound and interesting. But is it dramatically compelling? The answer is no. The script, written by Levinson, is too predictable and pat. Even scenes meant to heighten the adrenaline are, at best, somewhat limp. And while the performances are workmanlike, they are far from memorable.

Take Liberty Heights for what it is: a middling film larded with good intentions.

Offering many good maps and rare illustrations, the Oxford Atlas of Exploration is a colourful compendium detailing hundreds of voyages and expeditions that increased our knowledge of the world.

The book stretches from pre-Roman to modern times. The final sections focus on remaining exploratory challenges: the ocean depths, the mountain heights, the tropical forests, the scorching deserts, the polar regions. Makes a good gift for students and armchair travellers.

A musical journey

But even in death there is hope, and the Syracuse chorus performed Inscription of Hope by Z. Randall Stroope, based on words found in in the cellar of a house in Cologne, Germany, where Jews had lived. The inscription reads, in part, "Hope held firm will eventually reign."

The hope that the Jewish people will live has been realized. The journey has taken many to North America, where different cultures live side by side. So the concert included an excerpt from Mass, by Leonard Bernstein, and Keewaydin, by Canadian composer Harry Freedman.

Keewaydin is, Jennie explained, a list of native Canadian names, which may each mean something, although the piece has no overall message.

It is heard as a series of sounds that convey a feeling of being in the wilderness, ending with the echoing call of a loon.

Following the medleys by Gershwin and Copland, with which the young choristers clearly had fun, the concert concluded with a message of peace – and not just for the Jewish people.

The combined choirs sang, in Hebrew, Al Shlosha D'varim, by a young composer, Allan E. Naplan: "The world is sustained by three things, by truth, by justice, and by peace."

Business Profile

Three young entrepreneurs make kids happy

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ask Anton Rabie, president of Spin Master Toys, the three top reasons why a toy company succeeds, and he'll tell you – selection, selection, selection.

Rabie, 27, who owns the company along with Ronnen Harary, 27, CEO, and Ben Varadi, 28, executive vice-president, says the toy selection process is critical. "We're all about finding great products. If someone comes to us with an idea that we think is special, we'll develop it."

Rabie and Harary, who met at camp Northland when they were 10 years old, produced and marketed a university poster called Campus Faces in 1991, while attending business school at the University of Western Ontario.

Just days after graduation, they were joined in business by Varadi, and with $10,000 in start-up capital, introduced the Earth Buddy. This novelty item, which grows grass of out its head when watered,had taken off in Israel.

"The success of our business – then called the Earth Buddy Partnership – was a complete and total surprise. There are no words to describe that first year. We had bumped into an item that catapulted the company," Rabie said.

"It was more of a project than a business. We just produced the Earth Buddy, and then sold it. We were focusing on maximizing our opportunity."

Six months after its launch more than 1.5 million units had been produced and sold, 200 employees were employed in the factory, and Earth Buddy had Canada-wide distribution, he says.

"The magic of the product is that it is like a pet; it had an interactive component. People would wake up and water it – they nurtured it. It was the Pet Rock phenomenon."

Subsequently, the trio introduced Spin Master Devil Sticks, a three-piece juggling set that quickly became the country's number one, non-promoted toy, he says.

It was Air Hogs, however, a line of toy planes powered solely by air pressure, requiring no gas and batteries, that took the company soaring.

When the three partners saw a prototype of the Air Hog in 1996, other toy companies, including Mattel and Hasbro, had already passed on the idea. They had a vision, however, "of it flying far – of doing huge loops. We just felt we had to do it."

The planes took 2½ years to develop, at a cost of $500,000, but the biggest risk was the uncertainty that revolved around the project, he says. "There was no existing category for air-powered planes, no engineering model to follow, and most of all, there were many warnings from industry experts about the dangers of the flying category; after all, whatever goes up, has to come down."

Risks aside, however, Spin Master was able to set up the Air Hog line in the Orient, manage production, apply quality control procedures and mass manufacture the product.

In 1998, the Air Hog, which Rabie describes as "the world's farthest flying air pressure plane," which had an ability to fly more than 100 yards, the length of a football field, was one of the holiday season's best-selling toys.

Popular Science magazine featured Air Hogs on its December 1998 cover as one of the year's top achievements in science and technology. By June 1999, the company had produced its one millionth unit.

The beauty of the plane, which Rabie considers a "high-ticket toy" at about $40, is that it is safe and easy to use, he says. "The propeller is plastic and has a large foam nose cone that keeps fingers away from the blades, and allows kids to stop rotation easily and safely."

As well, "the plastic is strong, the wings were designed to absorb crashes, no maintenance is required, and it has real sound and real flight. It is much easier to start and fly than gas-powered planes. Boys and girls as young as eight years old can conquer flight."

Since its inception, says Rabie, Spin Master has become a different company. "The greatest thrill, is that we've developed worldwide distribution. It is powerful to know that we have toys in every first- and second-world country.

"The company is no longer related to an item," says Rabie, "but rather, it is related to who we are. We've built a team, and we've made a difficult transition from an entrepreneurial company to one that enjoys global leadership."

There are more than 50 people working at the company's Toronto head office, and an office has also been opened in Hong Kong to oversee manufacturing. There are also showrooms in New York and Dallas.

"We have, however, maintained the entrepreneurial spirit," says Rabie. "Creativity, passion and ingenuity is the personality of the company.

"We still get very excited when we take a product from a to z. It is after we select an item, that we do what we do best – coming up with packaging, which is awesome, and developing a marketing strategy."

Afterwards, he says, "Ben [Varadi] oversees operations – what it looks like and what it works like. We see a product through from the very beginning to the very end."

Currently, Rabie says, the company is seeking a general manager in the Orient. "We're taking the company to the next level. We need to have engineers there to do quality control. It is a major step.

"In the next year, we should have 50 people working in Hong Kong. On simpler projects, all the work will be able to be done there."

Spin Master's latest products include the Flick Trix finger bikes, finger-play bikes that sell for about $10. "There is a boiling going on in the marketplace because of these bikes – there is such a demand," says Rabie.

The partners were so impressed when they first saw the bikes, he says, "that we took the whole thing to market in 75 days. That is an example of our entrepreneurial ability."

The bikes are made from sturdy, die-cast materials, have working front and back brakes, interchangeable mag and spoked wheels, and are complete with a metal wrench, real-working crank and working U-lock, Rabie says. "The bikes are anything but a toy. Collectors, enthusiasts, and even riders themselves are into them. It is a true trend, there seems to be no age limit, and people of all ages are getting into them."

The best thing about the bikes, says Harary "is all the tricks you can do. Since everything on the finger bikes work, kids can practise and perform all the tricks that the pros do. That's the kind of interactivity that makes a toy great."

Extreme sports, such as snowboarding and downhill mountain biking have become the rage, and these bikes are at the heart of extreme sports, says Rabie. "There is also a trend towards finger-play toys, so we've piggy-backed a lot of trends."

The prediction for Chanukah, he says, is that "consumers will be lucky to get a bike. Mastermind has had so many requests that they've asked us to air freight 5,000 pieces. If a store is willing to air freight in a product, there is serious reason for it."

Play director shares his love of Broadway melodies

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Actor, director and teacher Allan Price has been sharing his love of the musical stage in a program he runs called Broadway Melody.

"Broadway Melody is a singing class for people that enjoy singing," he says. "It is not a vocal class, it is just an enjoyment of the music."

Participants do 10 to 15 songs a night, all taken from Broadway. The 10-week fall program concludes with a concert on Dec. 6.

Price's passion for the theatre began at University of Toronto in the play The Brothers Karamazov. This experience not only introduced him to theatre, but to his future wife Liz, now a computer programmer. The couple has since had two sons, Matthew 29 and Jonathan 24.

After college, Price picked up some roles in TV and theatre. Many may remember Price on the television series, The Hart and Lorne Terrific Hour.

To supplement his acting income, Price taught drama in North York. "I used to get acting jobs during the summer holidays, one of these jobs, I tried to keep secret from my students. It was a lead part in Ivan Reitman's first feature film called Cannibal Girls, starring Andrea Martin and Eugene Levy.

"It was a comedy/horror flick, which had a bit of nudity. I was seen in bed with one of the girls just before getting cannibilized. Needless to say, some of my students saw the film, by sneaking into the theatre, pretending to be 18. It caused a bit of a stir with my principal!"

After being out of touch with the theatre community for a decade, in the mid-80s Price auditioned for a part in Guys and Dolls at The Leah Posluns Theatre in Toronto. It was the first of 18 shows he was cast for at the theatre.

"Reva Stern, who was the artistic director and directed me in a number of the productions was a mentor, encouraged me and gave me confidence," he says.

"I like the stage because it is fresh every night. On stage you can feel the audience. I feel theatre is a combination of you as the performer, the writer who is giving you the words and situation and the audience, who mean an awful lot. You get an immediate response from the audience, which you don't get from a technician behind a camera. I don't feel as comfortable in film work. It's all acting but in some ways it is a different discipline and skill."

Of late, the thespian has been in great demand, just wrapping a beer commercial and a small part in the film Piano Man's Daughter.

He has been teaching kids at CharActors and helped form a theatre company out of Thornhill for which he directed Annie, Wizard of Oz and co-directed Alice in Wonderland.

His next offering as a director will be Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dream Coat at Leah Posluns in March.

Price just finished a successful run playing Ivan in the Norm Foster play, Drinking Alone, for Tribal Productions, held at the Studio Theatre at the Ford Centre. So pleased with his work in Drinking Alone and last year's production of Office Hours, Tribal has already cast the actor in their next two Studio Theatre plays. He'll portray "The Old Man" in Prelude to a Kiss, running Feb. 23 - March 12 and "The Father" in Broadway Bound from April 25 - May 14.

Music lovers with a penchant to sing can book a seat for the Dec. 6 Broadway Melody at 8:30 p.m. at CharActors Theatre Troupe at 11 Glencameron Rd. Unit #4 in Thornhill. There is no charge and it is open to anyone interested in taking the 12-week winter class. Call 905-764-5695.

Eat or workout with Yiddish videos

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Gym junkies and others who like mameloshen during their workouts or while they are cooking will enjoy two Yiddish videos.

Shvitz! My Yiddish Workout is a 30-minute video with English subtitles featuring three actors who perform their exercises with lots of Yiddish.

Veteran actress of the Yiddish stage, Shifra Lerer, demonstrates exercises for arms, legs and abdomen. She illustrates variations for beginners and seniors, and seated versions of the floor exercises. Along the way, she says arofshtup (push up), fus-oyftsi (leg stretch), and aksi-kvetsh (shoulder shrug).

In the background there is lively klezmer music, including accordion pieces by Michael Spudic, a non-Jewish active Yiddishist.

Lerer appears again in the half-hour presentation NO SHMALTZ! My Yiddisheh Cooking Video as the bubbie who gives low-fat, dairy-free recipes for nine dishes, mock liver, egg-free matzah-balls, knishes, broth, babaganoush, Armenian tomato soup, and chickpea cutlets, among them.

She freely gives advice that knobel (garlic) is good for high blood pressure, and smacking her lips, after a delicious dish, says her enemies should not enjoy such good taste.

Lerer claims that the term mameloshen is derived from men losing their tongues after their wives begin to speak.

A neophyte at making videos, producer Roland Millman says some of the actors have still not been paid.

As a Chanukah gift, he is offering both videos at the combined price of $40 (US) plus $6 in shipping charges, or for $24.95 each, plus shipping charges. Phone 201-451-6984, or contact Millman at 144 Morris St., Jersey City, N.J., 07302-4443, Ruvn@AOL.com.

Ethiopian runners give Israel Olympic hope

By WENDY ELLIMAN
WZPS

TEL AVIV — The concept is wholly east European, and sure enough, it is fathered by a Russian. But the place is Israel and, although it wasn't planned that way, the youngsters are all Ethiopian.

In 1997, with the blessing of the country's Ministry of Education, Culture and Sport, Israel's Russian-born national trainer Arkady Sklar set out to identify gifted young Israeli runners, nurture and train them to international standards and, hopefully, carry off a gold medal in the next Olympics.

"It wasn't conceived of as a program for Ethiopian youngsters," says Sklar. "But, quite simply, that's where the talent lies. Of the 15 boys selected for this first group, all were born in Ethiopia."

Salamon Elias, 16, is one of them. "I'd been in Israel for four years, and had been running seriously for three," he says. "I knew I was good because I always won, but I never thought of doing anything with it."

An only child, Elias lost his mother in infancy. His father is a truck driver and is often away from their Haifa home. The invitation to move to a residential high school as part of a special training program couldn't have been more welcome.

For 15-year-old Amir Getz, his selection was like "a gift from heaven." Although devoted to his family, it was extremely crowded in the tiny pre-fab Hadera apartment. "Sure I miss my mom and my dad, my brothers and my sisters," he says. "But I see them every few weeks, and here at the youth village I have my own bed, my own worktable and my own space."

Ethiopian-born Israeli youngsters in training at their home in the Hadassah Neurim Youth Village near Netanya. [WZPS photo]

The Hadassah Neurim youth village, situated on the seashore north of Netanya, is where Getz, Elias and the others now live and study. Part of Israel's unique Youth Aliya network of residential schools designed, in part, for young newcomers to Israel, it is supported by Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, and the Jewish Agency for Israel. During its 51 years, Hadassah Neurim has run a range of experimental and national-level projects for the thousands of youngsters educated and cared for on its pastoral campus.

"We were more than happy to take this one on," says Avi Ohayon, sports project co-ordinator at Hadassah Neurim. "We're experienced, we have two stadiums, we're close to the Wingate Physical Culture Institute, which designed and supervises the training program, and we're right on the beach, so the boys can run for miles along the shore."

But the youth village took the project on with some very explicit strictures. "First," says Ohayon, "the boys are part and parcel of the school. Although their training and even their diet set them apart, they are expected to apply themselves to the regular high school curriculum, study together with the general student body, and play a full part in the life of the village.

"Second, we stress that classroom study is as important to their future as their running, and we're happy that most are very strong in math, physics, chemistry and geography as well as on the track."

Uri Saalo, 15, Israel's 3,000-metre youth champion, has just added electronics to his study load.

"When the running is over, I'll have a good alternate career option," he says.

Elias's plans for the future, however, are focused on the track. "I guess I'll have to stop running when I get to 30," he says (which, from his perspective is still half a lifetime away). "Then I think I'd like to be a trainer. Perhaps Israel's national trainer like Arkady."

The 15 young runners stand out among the 800 teenagers at Hadassah Neurim – the Israelis, the Russians, even the 200 Ethiopians.

"Yes, I guess we are a kind of elite," says Saalo. "We have different food from the others – high-calorie, high-vitamin. We go to Wingate twice a week for training, we get up earlier than the others to run before breakfast every morning, and then again all afternoon, and, of course, we travel all over Israel, and sometimes abroad, for contests."

Saalo recently took second place in the 3,000 metres in the European youth championships half-marathon, and came seventh in the world championship in China.

The Inside Back

Time to say goodbye

By JONATHAN SHIFF

Since this is the last time this column will appear, I thought I would take the opportunity to share some general thoughts about the Israeli legal system. Trying to summarize such a complex topic in a few words is destined to failure, but I believe it is important enough to try.

As anyone who follows Israeli society and politics will know, the courts have taken an increasingly important role in shaping the nature of the country. From its hesitant start in the early days of the State, the Supreme Court has created civil rights, and established norms of behaviour which apply to the various branches of government.

This activity has evolved from simply protecting the citizen from capricious acts of bureaucrats, to highly developed doctrines of civil liberties that in many ways do not fall below those of countries like the United States and Canada.

This is not to say there isn't room for criticism. In my opinion, the courts have sometimes overstepped the boundary, substituting their views for those of the elected officials, even when there was no legal basis to do so.

Thus, for example, court decisions preventing ministers from appointing certain people to the civil service, or even telling the prime minister he may not appoint someone to the cabinet, while helping to establish proper norms of behavior, may lead to a situation where actions can be pronounced illegal simply because the judges don't like them.

Furthermore, court intervention in some social issues involving, for example, religion and the state, smacks of policy-making on the part of the judges. In effect, the judges seem to forget sometimes that there are some social or political ills they cannot solve.

The real danger is that this overextension may in fact undermine the very real and important roles the court does play. If the Knesset should react to a legally problematic judgment, for example, by curtailing the court's power to overturn legislation, we will have lost an important bastion of democracy in Israel. If you will excuse the pun, the court's powers are best used judiciously.

At the same time, there has been neglect of another part of the legal system. Whether you believe it stems from lack of budgets, from the fact that the current leadership of the court is uninterested, or that Israeli society is simply too litigious, the fact remains that the courts are terribly clogged, and it can take years for even simple cases to wind their way through the system.

The old cliché that justice delayed is justice denied is very true, and if the courts cannot fulfil the basic role of judging disputes, the rule of law will suffer enormous damage. Whatever the root causes, the leaders of the legal establishment must put their rivalries aside and solve this problem before the courts become irrelevant to most citizens, with the disastrous results we have seen elsewhere.

In other words, it is not easy to sum up the state of the Israeli legal system on the verge of the millennium. We have certainly come a long way in 50 years, from the remnants of non-democratic systems left by the Ottomans and the British, to a modern system protecting civil rights and creating the infrastructure required for a vibrant economy. At the same time there are things, which need to be repaired, and we ignore them at our peril.

In any case, I hope that this column has been helpful in illustrating some of these points. Even more so, I hope that readers will continue to follow legal developments in Israel, which are an essential component of the social and political changes our country is undergoing.

MARTIN & FRAN CAPLAN WISH YOU A JOYOUS CHANUKAH

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have been invited to my neighbour's wedding, and my husband and I are arguing about how much the gift should be.

I think that these days you don't give anything less than $200 per couple. He says I'm nuts. He thinks because we don't know these people very well, we are in no way obligated to spend that kind of money.

I have to see these people every day. I would be totally embarrassed giving them anything less than $200, which I believe to be the going rate. I can't bear the thought of being called a "schnorer" behind my back.

What do you feel is the appropriate amount that should be given for a wedding, or even for a bar or bat mitzvah? I know that if you agree with me, it will put an end to our arguing and my husband will just go with it.

How much is too much

Dear How much is too much

It's an interesting question you are asking. What is appropriate to give at a wedding or a bar or bat mitzvah? As I am not an expert in this field, I decided to poll some folks who either attend many of these functions or are in the process of making a simchah.

The answers I got were varied. I heard anything from $36 for a bar mitzvah to $300 for a wedding. The rationales I got for those answers were everything from "I can't afford too much, I am invited to too many affairs" to "That doesn't even pay for the meal." Many of the answers also hinged on how well people knew the couple or family.

Here is the bottom line:

The majority of people asked said for a wedding or night affair bar or bat mitzvah, the appropriate amount is $200 per couple. For an afternoon affair, the amount is $150 per couple.

I would be interested to hear from you, our readers, what you think the proper gift should be. Is it really appropriate to expect your guest to pay for the equivalent of their meal? Does the gift always have to be monetary? Does it really matter if the people are neighbours, acquaintances or relatives? I was at a wedding recently where a few people gave no gift at all.

I always thought a simchah was just that. A gathering of one's closest friends and relatives all coming together to celebrate your happiness. How idealistic!!

Jerusalem: The capital for secular and religious Jews

By GIL TROY
Special to The CJN

About 15 years ago, I had Shabbat dinner in Jerusalem with a retired radio reporter. He had spent three decades covering Israel for America's old Mutual Broadcasting network. I forget his name – but I will never forget his story.

His was a typical Israeli apartment, a bit too small, overflowing with a few too many books. The furniture was simple but not shabby, with a picture of an officer in uniform dominating the living room wall-unit.

And he was a typical journalist, well educated, wide-ranging, brimming with great stories.

"What was his greatest moment in journalism," I asked him, whereupon he left the table, cued up an old reel-to-reel tape machine on his wall-unit, and said, "Listen."

The tape was from the morning of June 7, 1967. My host had set out early that morning, and ended up at an Israeli command post on Rechov Strauss, in the centre of Jerusalem, with a good view of the ancient walled city. As my friend set the scene, I tried to picture tanks and soldiers, half-tracks and stretchers, amid the tacky souvenir shops and pungent schwarma stands of today's Jerusalem. The tape began with a description of the efforts of Mota Gur's paratrooper brigade to reach the Old City.

The reporter's dispassionate, descriptive, professional tone sounded to the ears of this spoiled American like the play-by-play of a well-paced basketball or hockey game. Only this time, the roar of ammunition replaced the roar of the crowds.

Then, from his perch, the reporter saw the paratroopers pierce Lion's Gate and enter the Old City. All of sudden, he burst out: "After 2,000 years, the Jewish people have liberated Jerusalem! Jerusalem is ours once again!"

Hearing this man shift from objective reporter to proud Jew, gave me goose bumps. His sense of history, the way he felt the past in the present, instinctively echoed the stirring battle orders handed to the troops that morning, which read: "Final objective: the Temple Mount, the Western Wall, the Old City. For 2,000 years our people have prayed for this moment. Kadimah [Let us go forward] – to victory."

As my host turned off the tape recorder, I asked about the picture on the wall-unit.

"That," he said, "is my son. He died in Lebanon two years ago."

This journalist was a true Yerushalmi, a Jerusalemite, infected by the spirit of the city. Mesmerized by the city's past, he could not simply sit on the sidelines. Despite his professional training, he had to get involved, he had to be passionate, he had to commit his soul, and his family's future, to the Jewish people's eternal city. He had paid an exorbitant price, but he had no regrets.

Peace prevails on Israeli version of Sesame Street

By VIVA PRESS
Israel CJN Bureau

JERUSALEM — Carrying a bag of falafel, Dafi surprises Haneen when she shows up for lunch. Haneen looks to her mentor Adel, who is preparing hummus, for reassurance.

With Adel's nod of approval, Haneen welcomes Dafi and the two quickly fall into animated conversation.

They shriek and giggle as they repeat the names of the food they're eating. "Falafel, hummus," they screech.

Haneen is a Palestinian orange Muppet with a mop of pink hair. She lives on Shara'a Simsim. Dafi, purple with blue pigtails, is an Israeli Muppet from Rehov Sumsum.

They are two of the stars of an Israeli-Palestinian co-production of Sesame Street, where Arabs and Jews are on friendly terms despite living on separate streets.

This friendliness is more a myth than the reality of the mutual distrust still prevalent between Israelis and Palestinians today. However, liberal educators on both sides of the conflict are hoping this joint Sesame Street – showing similarities in language and culture – will prevent further prejudices from taking root at an early age.

At a symposium recently held in Jerusalem, Children's Television Workshop (CTW), which produces the American Sesame Street series, Al-Quds University's Institute of Modern Media, and Israel Education Television (IETV) officials met to discuss and evaluate the effectiveness of the new program.

"The show is having an impact. Israeli and Palestinian kids are saying nicer things about each other," said Gary Knell, president and CEO-elect of CTW.

Rehov Sumsum/Sharu'a Simsim (Sesame Street in Hebrew/Arabic) was created because of a belief that television could be used to inspire a new generation of Israeli and Palestinian children to learn about each other. Now, 70 half-hour programs later, research shows that it has done just that.

"After four month's exposure, kids were more likely to say positive things [about one another]," said Charlotte Cole, vice president of international research at CTW in New York.

She said Israeli and Palestinian kids who had negative images of one another – Israeli kids seeing Palestinians as dirty, and Palestinians seeing Israelis as violent – now had more positive images of the other group.

Citing the hummus-falafel skit, Cole said that "when kids see someone eating the same foods, it is very powerful to them."

Einat Yanai believed TV could influence children, so much so that she contacted IETV and had them build a Sesame Street in her kindergarten.

"In my seven years as a teacher, I never saw anything like it," she said referring to how her class of 35 kids reacted to the street. "The kids really loved the street. Their advancement was incredible."

Kids learn to accept others

The children learned how to count from the show, how to say some words in Arabic, and most of all, learned to accept others different from themselves, said Yanai, whose kindergarten was in Ramat Gan, just north of Tel Aviv.

The co-production was inspired by the 1993 handshake on the White House lawn between late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

"When we saw the handshake, we knew that was an opportunity," said Lewis Bernstein, CTW's vice-president for international special projects, on a recent visit to Jerusalem.

"That was a beginning," he said.

The program is the first foreign co-production by two national groups.

It is also the first Palestinian rendition of the Sesame Street concept. An Israeli version of the show, ran from 1981 till 1998.

In the Israeli-Palestinian production, the Arab puppets and characters speak Arabic, and their Israeli counterparts speak Hebrew.

Bilingual Adel and Amal, human characters on the show, serve as interpreters.

The program began airing 18 months ago. Both series are taped in Israel Television's studios in Tel Aviv.

Rehov Sumsum is broadcast on IETV, while Shara'a Simsim is broadcast on Al-Quds Educational Television. Each show has its own producers and writers.

On Rehov Sumsum/Shara'a Simsim the characters don't all live on the same street. Instead, they visit one another.

Two years ago when the show was still in its early stages, Daoud Kuttab, Palestinian executive producer of the show, and Dolly Wolbrum, the Israeli executive producer, were stumped as to how the characters would meet each other.

The teams settled on "cross-over" segments in which characters who inhabit the Israeli street visit the Palestinian street and vice versa.

The Israeli characters – including Kippi, a pink porcupine who embodies the Israeli spirit of being prickly on the outside but sweet on the inside, and Dafi, a three-year-old girl puppet – live on a boardwalk with a view of the Mediterranean.

The Palestinians – including Karim, a rooster who exemplifies pride in Palestinian culture, and Haneen, a three-year-old Palestinian girl Muppet full of curiosity – live on a street surrounded by arid hills and olive trees.

The cross-over sections "show the different cultures. The idea is to see the other, to recognize the other, and to accept them," said Wolbrum.

The show, intended to promote tolerance and respect for others, is itself a unique production partnership among Israelis and Palestinians.

"I didn't think a joint program would work," said Kuttab. "I feel satisfied [with the program]. We were able to keep to the goals that we had."

The Palestinian and Israeli creators succeeded in working together despite the political unrest they faced – including the assassination of Rabin, bus bombings in Israel, and riots in the West Bank and Gaza.

According to research, of the households with children under eight who watch television, 55 percent watch the program. Amongst Arab-Israelis, 67 percent of their children watch the program; 41 percent of Israeli children watch; and 57 percent of Palestinian children tune in.

Ironically, just as the program has proved fruitful, production of new episodes has ceased.

Despite the positive climate at the symposium recently, the project's leaders are still undecided whether to go ahead with a new season and a new fund-raising campaign.

However, Wolbrum is optimistic about the future. "It was a mission impossible back then and with the outcome we now have, I believe it will continue," she said.

City for secular & religious

The power of Jerusalem reminds us that Zionism is a passionate, romantic movement – even if you are secular! A typical Israeli, this man did not think twice about flipping on a tape recorder during his Shabbat meal, but to call him "secular" is to ignore how deeply Jewish, how profoundly religious, he and so many of his actions were.

Zionism is a characteristically schizophrenic product of the characteristically schizophrenic 19th century, a century of rationalism and romanticism. Zionism was a product of the Enlightenment. It was rationalist, liberal, scientific and nationalist. But it also sought to compensate for the failures of the Enlightenment with a fundamentalist, romantic, spiritual and religious movement.

Theodor Herzl, whose political Zionism is now remembered as overwhelmingly pragmatic, secular and unromantic, did promise that with a Jewish state: "We shall live at last as free men on our own soil, and in our own homes peacefully die." But his imagination also soared when he envisioned the Switzerland-in-the-sand, the "Altneuland," old-new land, he hoped to build.

"The world will be liberated by our freedom, enriched by our wealth, magnified by our greatness," Herzl gushed. "And whatever we attempt there for our own benefit will redound mightily and beneficially to the good of all mankind."

Herzl learned the hard way just how profoundly religious his supposedly secular nationalist movement was. When he considered the British offer to establish a Jewish homeland in Uganda (actually the Kenyan highlands), his followers rebelled. Most understood that Zionism would not survive without Zion.

In synagogues throughout the world, when taking the Torah out of the Ark, Jews sing, "Kee mi Tzion tezeh Torah, U davar Adoshem me'Yerushalayim," the Torah will come forth from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem.

Zion, the biblical name for Jerusalem, is not just the 3,000-year-old capital of the Jewish people. It is the intellectual, cultural and spiritual centre of Jewish gravity.

Mentioned more than 800 times in the Bible, it was the city of David the heroic, who conquered it, and of Solomon the wise, who built the first of the two Holy Temples there.

During the many centuries of exile, Jerusalem symbolized both the glorious past of the Jewish people and their hopes for the future. Much of Jewish prayer, in fact, entailed reflecting on what there once was in Jerusalem as a way of conceptualizing what might again be there.

The fate of the Jewish people seemed tied directly to the fate of Jerusalem. As the great philosopher Martin Buber noted in 1934, "When Jerusalem ceased to be a Jewish city, when the Jew was no longer permitted to be at home in his own country, it is then that he was hurtled into the abyss of the world. Ever since, he has represented to the world the insecure man."

Most Zionists understood that only if Jerusalem was redeemed could the Jews be redeemed as well.

Jerusalem was such a vital symbol during the exile that it both inspired and repelled early Zionists. In the early throes of the Zionist revolution against rabbinic casuistry, some zealots discounted the centrality of Jerusalem. Hoping to build a new Europe in their ancient homeland, some young rebels felt compelled to reject the way Jerusalem had been used to anesthetize the Jews. To them, the Jerusalemite was a hostage to fate, awaiting the Messiah in prayerful silence while relying, in the meantime, on the next best thing – a handout from abroad.

Labour Zionists, in particular, sought a Nietzschean, "transvaluation of values," to transcend the passivity, the scholasticism, the excessive rationalism of the Diaspora Jew and the pious Jerusalemite.

Micah Joseph Berdicheviski rejected the rabbinic teaching that "Whoever walks by the way and interrupts his study to remark, 'How fine is that tree, how fine is that field,' forfeits his life!"

Berdicheviski believed that "Judah and Israel will be saved when another teaching is given unto us, namely: 'Whoever walks by the way and sees a fine tree and a fine field and leaves them to think on other thoughts, that man is like one who forfeits his life!' Give us back our fine trees and fine fields!" he cried at the turn of the century.

The capital for all Jews

"Give us back the universe!"

Ultimately, however, Jerusalem was such a central part of the Zionist's material and spiritual world that the idea had to be updated and reconfigured, but not rejected.

Even in 1882, a decade before Herzl, the gruff pioneers of Bilu (a group of young Jews fleeing the Russian pogroms) remembered being "a nation possessing a wise religion, a law, a constitution, a celestial Temple, whose wall [the Western wall] is still a silent witness to the glories of the past."

Establishing a modern, international movement, they chose an ancient city for their head office – Jerusalem. Conflating seemingly religious and secular symbols, they amended the Shema, the most fundamental of Jewish prayers to read: "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is one, and our land, Zion, is our one hope."

Four decades and two aliyot (waves of immigration) later, the great poet Chaim Nachman Bialik reconciled the rationalism and the passion, the nationalism and the spirituality, the modernism and the traditionalism, pulsating through Zionism.

The founding of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem on Jan. 4, 1925, marked a great moment in the development of the fledgling nation-state. The opening of this university testified to the rationalist, scientific side of Zionism, and also to a certain comfort level – if you can stop draining swamps and toiling in the fields to study, you are well on your way to building a sophisticated nation-state.

Bialik, who made his reputation with his poetry of oppression, of misery, of exile, now offered some prose of liberation.

Standing on Mount Scopus with its breathtaking view of Jerusalem's cobblestone alleyways and ancient walls, Bialik played on the notion of this new university joining a long line of "nationalist schools in all their forms" – the cheder, a one-room Torah school for young eastern European boys; the yeshivah, a grand institution of Torah study; the beit midrash, a smaller study house, often linked with a synagogue.

The enlightened poet used biblical language to celebrate this modern "festival" and to synthesize the rough-hewn pioneers with their pale, intellectual cousins, to link the secular workers with the religious dreamers.

Speaking of the pioneers and invoking the traditional Jewish concept of Yerushalayim shel Lemalah and Yerushalayim shel Lematah, the Jerusalem on high and the Jerusalem below, he cried: "Let those youths build the earthly Jerusalem with fire and let them who work within these walls build the Heavenly Jerusalem with fire, and between them let them build and establish our House of Life, 'for thou, O Lord, didst consume it with fire, and with fire Thou wilt rebuild it.'" was finally launched, in May 1948, war tore apart the city of peace. David Ben-Gurion, who had expediently but broken-heartedly accepted the United Nations' 1947 partition plan, read the Declaration of Independence from Tel Aviv.

Secular and religious mourned Old City's fall

Many "secular" Zionists preferred Tel Aviv, a refreshing city of the future, a Zionist city lacking the historical baggage of Jerusalem. But two weeks later, when the Old City fell, the secular and the religious mourned together.

How odd it was. After 2,000 years, the Jews had a state. They controlled most of the city of Jerusalem. But without Har HaBayit, the most purely religious part of the city, without the site of the Holy Temple and the Jewish quarter, the State of Israel was not whole. The divided city came to symbolize the great costs of maintaining a state – while also becoming a potent national-cultural symbol for secular Zionists.

In 1949, when the United Nations voted to internationalize the city, Prime Minister Ben-Gurion, the secular Zionist prophet governing from Tel Aviv, told his colleagues: "Pack up. We're all moving to Jerusalem tomorrow."

On Jan. 23, 1950, the Israeli Parliament, the Knesset, proclaimed Jerusalem would "always" be "the capital of the Jewish nation." Since July 1950, diplomats have presented their credentials to Israel's president in Jerusalem.

During those frustrating 19 years, as the Jordanians desecrated synagogues and cemeteries, turning sanctuaries into stables and headstones into cobblestones, Jews throughout the world learned just how important Jerusalem was to them.

By 1967, the songwriter Naomi Shemer had captured the profound Jewish longing for a united capital in her stirring Yerushalayim Shel Zahav. Shemer's Jerusalem is a golden city that delights the senses, stirs the soul, fills the heart and engages the mind. It is an eternal city, a city deeply tied to the Jewish people, where time stands still, where ancient markets still bustle, where 20th-century moderns become time-travellers wandering from reminders of one milestone in Jewish history to another.

1967 initiated Golden era

The 1967 victory – secured by modern weaponry but appropriately celebrated with the blowing of the shofar, the venerable ram's horn – initiated modern Jerusalem's golden era. The battle-hardened, deeply secular kibbutznik soldiers who wept unashamedly at the newly liberated Western Wall underscored the nationalist significance of the Holy Temple's ruins.

With that rumpled genius, Teddy Kollek, at the helm, the city banked its future on preserving its past. Putting millions of Diaspora dollars to good use, Kollek and his Jerusalem Foundation polished one architectural diamond after another, creating a dazzling tiara of old-new beauty in the reunited capital of Herzl's "Altneuland."

Developers built upward, transforming the venerable skyline, balancing gleaming skyscrapers against golden towers. At the same time, an army of archeologists burrowed deep into the city's core, adding new dimensions, literally and figuratively, to the Jews' relationship with their capital as they uncovered material proof of the Jews' time-honoured love for the city.

The result is a magical mix of the Kotel and the Knesset, the old and the new, the east and the west. To the east, in the Old City, a museum with remnants from Second Temple times displays the earliest representation of a menorah, the seven-handed candelabra. To the west, in the New City, a large menorah stands sentry outside Israel's parliament, testifying to the modern sovereign state's ancient but vital roots.

To the east, the refurbished Cardo, the ancient shopping arcade, once again hums with merchants

City is an example of Arab-Jewish co-operation and shoppers, while to the west a huge new mall boasts that it is the largest shopping complex in the Middle East.

To the east, donkeys, cars and pedestrians crowd the narrow cobblestoned alleys, while to the west, sporty sedans whiz across the superhighway.

To the east, Muezzins chant, rabbis pray, mystics meditate, artists paint, vagrants beg, merchants haggle, while to the west, rock stars perform, politicians posture, scholars study, computer scientists program, pedestrians jaywalk, and businessmen haggle.

As the Jerusalem of earth and stones thrived, so, too, did its inhabitants. For nearly 20 years – until the outbreak of the intifadah in 1987 – Jerusalem, the city of peace, offered a remarkable example of Arab-Jewish co-operation. Yes, there were tensions lingering and traumas aplenty, but there were also business arrangements formed and lasting friendships made.

Jews wandered the back alleys of the Old City freely, respectfully, relishing the exotic warmth of the Arab casbah, relishing the Middle Eastern character of their modern state. Many Arabs, despite their frustrations, enjoyed the relative autonomy Mayor Kollek had secured for them. True, their land was occupied, but they were freer in Kollek's Jerusalem than were almost all of their brethren in the rest of the Arab world.

Today, alas, many secular Israelis and many North American Jews have allowed themselves to overlook the centrality of this city to our people. Now that we have it all, too many of us take it for granted.

References to Jerusalem are so ubiquitous in Jewish lore and liturgy that we become momentarily inured to the potency of the symbol. We may sing "Next year in Jerusalem" at our seders, we may even participate in a community march to Jerusalem every year, but we often fail to take that extra moment to savour our connection to the city.

Even more disturbing, as many Palestinians demand that Jerusalem serve as the capital of their independent state, too many Jews blithely cede Jerusalem to them. Some secular Israelis, overreacting to the supposed haredi "takeover" of Jerusalem, have simply decided to abandon the city to the anti-Zionists, be they Jews or Arabs.

To the extent that this abdication reflects a desperate yearning for peace, it is at least well-meaning; to the extent that it reflects the dry, clinical, excessively rationalistic approach too many sophisticated Jews take to contemporary Judaism and Zionism, it is pathetic. A century after the Zionist revolution began against the rabbis' dry, clinical, excessively rationalistic approach, we have come full circle. It is the modernizers who now risk deforming the Jewish soul.

During the recent election campaign, both Ehud Barak and Benjamin Netanyahu agreed that Jerusalem must remain united. Hopefully, some diplomatic mirage will be able to satisfy the Palestinian desire for Jerusalem while protecting the Jewish stake in the city. But no one should underestimate how important a Jewish Jerusalem is to the Jewish people and the Jewish state.

Forgetting the unhappy experiences when Jordan ruled, overlooking the practical difficulties of sharing the same territories, neglecting the Jewish people's unique and enduring relationship to the city, is foolhardy and dangerous.

We already learned in the 1950s and 1960s how central Jerusalem is to the Zionist enterprise. Jerusalem is not simply a piece of real estate that can be subdivided easily; it is the touchstone of Zionism and the state of Israel.

A cosmic element

"There is a cosmic element in nationality which is its basic ingredient," the Zionist thinker Nahum Syrkin explained. "That cosmic element may best be described as the blending of the natural landscape of the Homeland with the spirit of the people inhabiting it. This is the mainspring of a people's vitality and creativity, of its spiritual and cultural values. Any conglomeration of individuals may form a society in the mechanical sense, one that moves and acts, but only the presence of the cosmic element makes for an organic national entity with creative vitality."

"Eem eshcachech Yerushalayim, tishkach yemeini:" If I forget, if I forsake you, O Jerusalem, may my right hand lose its cunning, may my tongue cling to the roof of my mouth. If we abandon Jerusalem, we betray the essence of our being, that which makes us human, our hands and our mouths, our bodies and our souls. Jerusalem reminds us of the passion Zionism should evoke; Jerusalem transcends today's false and increasingly overstated dichotomy between the religious and the secular in our Zionism in our Judaism; Jerusalem should not be so easily abandoned.

FIRST PRIZE: Sitting on top of the world Israel summer '99

[Jeffery Spivock photo]

But what is an Israel Experience?

Excerpted from a speech at the closing ceremonies of the Canada Israel Summer Tours at the south Temple excavation in Jerusalem, August 1999.

By JEFFREY SPIVOCK

On the third or fourth day of this trip, I asked a madrichah about the $2,000 bursary that each one of us received to help pay for this trip. She explained to me that a Canadian philanthropist had pledged to help 120 young Jews journey to Israel.

I'll be perfectly honest, my initial thought was – tax credit. But as a student of many business courses I know of many other better ways to evade the feds.

I realized then, that this man must really believe that by allowing us to visit Israel, we would accomplish something important in the grand scheme of things.

So off I journeyed into the unknown, the fabled, the paradise known as Israel, surrounded by 41 other "investments." Each of these strangers around me had applied and had been chosen to run around Israel for one month and fulfil an Israel Experience.

But what is an Israel Experience?

Was it Shabbat at the Kotel? Or was it driving badly while talking on a cellphone and drinking Macabee beer?

Whatever it was, we took off with three eager madrichim, a medic and a slick bus driver. My initial shock came when the medic entered the bus with a large-scale piece of ammunition strapped to his back.

I was stunned and pondered its necessity. I was told two things: First, everyone in Israel has a gun and is properly trained, this is their way of life; secondly, the weapon in question was probably better off in a museum since it apparently hadn't been fired since the War of Independence.

As the weeks went on, this and other qualms of mine were no longer an issue. Soldiers and guns became as common as cellphones and falafel stands.

Even the language no longer stood in my way since I had mastered the most important phrase in the Hebrew language: Slicha, eifo hasherutim? (Excuse me, where is the bathroom?)

So what have I learned on this trip other than never to eat at a Bedouin tent and not to stand too close to the back of a camel?

That a trip, any trip, even one to Eretz Yisrael is not necessarily about a 3000 year-old wall or a large mountain with an ancient city on top; but to experience these moments with people who motivate you to see more, who challenge your ideas, whom you can agree with, and often disagree with, all the while remembering that they are all the same as you – young, vibrant, human beings.

Even more, I have learned tolerance on this trip. Tolerance not only of those who snore on the bus, enjoy loud music or are chronically late, but tolerance of all people who have different political views and tolerance of those who have different values…

This trip introduced me not only to the facts and numbers about political affiliations and spiritual beliefs, but has forced me to confront the differences on a first-hand basis, through interaction with both invited guests and talkative shwarma vendors. It has also allowed me to compare my reactions and understandings with my Canadian peers.

By being here I have come to understand that Israel is not the land of constant bombs and gunfire, as it is so often misrepresented by our media, but more of a vibrant multicultural society that is grappling with its formative years.

Just like us young adults, it is searching for a clear identity, to understand its role in society. And just like us, Israel has to deal with its good times and its bad, its bouts with bullies and peer pressure and its struggle for independence.

I hope that the tolerance which has been so profoundly instilled in me merely by being here can be applied on a much larger scale by all members of this society, and by all members of the larger community living beyond these walls and beyond these borders.

Let us all mature alongside Israel and may we grow old together, prospering each in our own right.

So Mr. Bronfman, I would like to give you an update on your portfolio and let you know how your investment is doing.

On July 5th I was $2,000. Tonight as I stand here before my friends, my brothers and sisters, my fellow human beings, I declare that I am $2,000 with interest.

Thank you.

Happy Chanukah

God blesses children and fools

By ANDREW FAINER
Special to The CJN

I meet her outside of shul. "Excuse me Sir. Could you take me to the Young Israel? The driver left me off at the wrong shul. I didn't think to look..."

This is Canada. Late November. The snow is here early. The sidewalks though plowed are icy.

I offer her my arm and my scarf. She left her coat and her cane in the car.

"I'll be all right. The sun is strong. It will keep the back of my head warm."

In the real world she'd be a lost lady out in the cold. I'd be too busy to stop, or simply not want to get involved.

But this is Jewish suburbia on Shabbat. I have a yarmulke on my head and a tallis bag in my arms. So she asks. I agree to help. Who could I pray to if I didn't?

We begin to walk.

She is short, though not shrunken. She is clothed and adorned and coiffed in quietly expensive taste.

"May I ask your name?"

"Mrs. Stein," she begins to smile, "and yours?"

"Andrew." I don't know why I don't say my last name.

"Julie," she's thinking that maybe that's the way young people introduce themselves these days. "It's not far? A lady told me it was just five minutes."

"I think it'll take us 10 to 15 minutes."

"That's OK."

"You sure you don't want my scarf?"

"Really, no. I am going to sweat." She sweats. She wipes her brow. "It's a good thing I left my fur coat in the car. It would be too heavy."

Illustration by Edward Dunbar

If she collapses somewhere between the two synagogues, who will I ask for help? How do I explain this to the authorities, to the others walking by?

"You're going to a bar mitzvah?"

"Yes, my nephew. My husband passed away last year."

"I'm very sorry."

"He was my third husband," as if to say again, it's OK. "He was 87 years old. Cancer. My first husband was murdered by the Nazis. We were Hungarian. They killed my whole family. I am the only one left. My second husband died in 1957, here in Montreal. I was married to my third husband for 28 years."

"Will the car come back to get you after services?"

"The car. My husband gave my nephew the car. The car and $10,000. To my nephew's sons he left $20,000."

"He was very generous."

"No he was stingy, never spent a penny. He left me the money, I gave it to them."

We stop to rest, catch our breath. It is only a five-minute walk for the people passing us in both directions. They're asking how could he let his grandmother not wear a coat. Jews ask lots of questions. Just to annoy God. We start again.

"So this is your nephew's bar mitzvah?"

"No, my husband's nephew's son." She looks to me so I'll understand a nephew's son's bar mitzvah means it's the nephew's bar mitzvah. She tells me she's not crazy.

Mrs. Stein continues to perspire. "I told you I sweat. I sweat all the time. It's only my face though. I'm only worried about the stairs. Are there a lot of stairs?"

There are a lot of stairs for someone who worries about stairs. She holds on to my arm a little more tightly. We walk upstairs to a door that's locked. She takes a deep breath before we start down. There are many stairs down to get inside the building. There are many more steps up to the sanctuary. We pass the teenage fugitives from the services on the way to the door.

We've made it.

"You could be my grandson, except they killed everyone. You're an angel." And she kisses me. I open the door for her.

A bar mitzvah boy, in skullcap and blindingly white tallit is reading from the Torah scroll. She finds her way to a seat. Walking through Nazis, three husbands and Canadian winters, she must be an angel. God tells her a nephew's son's bar mitzvah is her simchah too.

Everyone knows God blesses children and fools. Bless also the old people like Mrs. Stein. Why do you have her walking in the cold, without a coat?

European Jewry redefines itself 10 years after the Cold War ends

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

A decade ago, Jewish communities in Communist-dominated Eastern and Central Europe were generally written off as dying remnants of the pre-Holocaust past.

Forty years of communist restrictions had compounded the devastation of the Shoah.

Most who openly identified themselves as Jews were elderly. Many Jews chose to conceal or deny their Jewish identity. Others, particularly in the former Soviet Union, faced active persecution. To many observers, the Jewish chapter in this part of Europe was virtually closed.

The collapse of communism 10 years ago changed everything. Religious freedom and the disintegration of communist-era taboos triggered social, cultural and religious Jewish revival.

Exact figures have not been compiled, but throughout Eastern and Central Europe, thousands of Jews, particularly younger people, have discovered or reclaimed long-buried Jewish roots and openly declared a Jewish identity.

It has happened in Poland, in the Czech Republic and Slovakia, in Hungary, in Bulgaria – even in the countries of the former Yugoslavia.

While hundreds of thousands have immigrated to Israel and elsewhere from the former Soviet Union, hundreds of thousands have also stayed in Russia, Ukraine and other countries, and have reopened synagogues and schools and rebuilt communal structures.

"Jewish communities in the region are throwing off the mantle of 'remnant' like a garment that no longer fits," says Edward Serotta, an American photographer and writer who has documented Jewish communities in Eastern and Central Europe since the mid-1980s.

The impact of these changes has extended beyond the former communist states.

The emergence of newly active Jewish communities in the East, combined with the development of a new vision of a pluralistic Europe freed of artificial East-West frontiers, has created new opportunities, conditions and challenges for European Jewry in general.

The new freedoms have opened up a world of choices. And the outcome of these choices is still far from clear.

Jews in former communist states may be throwing off the mantle of remnant, but it is still too early to predict whether the momentum of what many call a Jewish Renaissance will carry through into the 21st century.

Optimistic vision of Jewish future

Indeed, much of the support and infrastructure for Jewish revival in former communist states has been, and still is, funded by foreign institutions such as the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and Chabad Lubavitch.

Not only that.

"Jews in Europe today are, first and foremost, voluntary Jews, their continued presence in European societies demonstrates a conscious personal commitment," says Paris-based historian Diana Pinto.

"They could just as easily disappear into anonymity, stop being Jews. And they are of course free to do so; it is one of their rights in a pluralistic democracy."

Pinto, in fact, espouses an optimistic vision of a Jewish future in Europe, one that links Jewish development with the development of post-Cold War civil society across the continent.

In this construct, the new European framework is seen as the basis for the potential emergence of a strengthened and self-confident European Jewry that can take its place both as a positive, creative force in Europe and as a "third pillar" alongside the Jews of America and Israel in global Jewish affairs.

This vision was celebrated at the end of May, when nearly 600 Jews from 39 countries converged on Nice, France, for the first General Assembly of the European Council of Jewish Communities.

"We are here to celebrate the pride and optimism of being Jews in Europe and being European Jews," council chair, Ruth Zilkha told the meeting.

"We are committed to building an exciting Jewish life as part of a new democratic and pluralistic Europe," she said. "We are at a very special moment of creation and vision."

Looming in the background, however, were dire predictions from pessimists like British Jewish scholar Bernard Wasserstein, who articulated his negative vision of the European Jewish future in a controversial book, Vanishing Diaspora, published three years ago.

Spin the dreidel:

Which is good, gimmel or nun?

By MARCEL STRIGBERGER
Special to The CJN

As Chanukah approaches, I recall my childhood days playing dreidel with the kids on the street in Montreal.

I grew up in a very cosmopolitan area, a veritable United Nations. Victor, who was of Ukrainian descent, was my best pal. We were both about nine years old when he saw me playing dreidel with my dad.

Noticing that pennies were being moved around feverishly, he asked what this strange game was, and my father suggested he join in. My dad then exited, leaving me to explain the rules to Victor.

I told him that we each ante up a penny and we spin. I pointed to the gimmel, indicating that this, in Yiddish, symbolized gantz or whole, and you take the whole pot. The nun meant nein or no. Nothing. The shin meant shtel or put and you had to add a penny.

I spun first and scored a gimmel. I cleaned out the pot and we anted up again, to Victor's chagrin. Unfortunately for Victor, he hit three shins in a row, and had to add to the pot. I landed on gimmel.

After his week's allowance had become decimated, he hit a nun. Victor's face lit up as he reached for the pot.

A Supreme Court decision

I said, "Victor, what are you doing?"

He responded with the exuberance of someone having won Lotto 649, "I have a gibble don't I?"

"No Victor, this is a nun. Look, it doesn't have a little tail."

Victor was not impressed with my explanation. After a few more nuns and shins, Victor departed, licking his wounds. His parting words were, "I don't like this Jewish game."

A few days later, I engaged Freddy, my Jewish pal of German origin, in a game. He spun a nun and he reached for the pot.

I shouted, "Hey Freddy, this is a nun."

He said, "So? Nun means nem, take in Yiddish."

I protested that nun means nein, gimmel wins.

"Gimmel?" He roared with laughter. "Gimmel means, gournisht, nothing. No way Jose. A gimmel loses."

I decided to ask the ultimate authority, the person who had all the answers to everything. My mother.

My mom of course came down on my side, telling Freddy that gimmel was good. Nun was nothing.

Freddy appealed this decision to his court of appeal, his mother. Freddy's mother was shocked, questioning my mother's heritage to have the chutzpah to suggest that you walk away emptyhanded on a nun.

During the discussion in Yiddish between our mothers, it even came out that to Freddy's kin a shin didn't even mean shtel. It stood for shlep as in shlep money out of the pot.

Freddy's mother, looking at my mom, then threw in a few unkind comments about Romanians and their alleged propensity for being less-than-Abraham-Lincoln honest.

This was just too much, and the game broke up, but we decided to let Freddy keep the penny, if as my mom put it, "your Yeke family really needs it."

Freddy's mother then indicated that Freddy no longer welcomed my dreidel business.

A couple of days later, I noticed Freddy spinning his dreidel on his walkway. I asked if I could join in. Suddenly his mother stuck her head out of the window reminding me of her lifelong ban.

As I stood there in dismay, who came along? Victor. He had replenished his stash and he was eager to win his money back. He challenged Freddy to a game. Victor felt lucky and he suggested they use nickels instead of pennies. Freddy obliged.

I sat down to watch.

Victor went first, and bingo, a gimmel. As he reached for the booty, Freddy grabbed his hand, suggesting that he keep his paws off the pot until he won.

In shock, Victor picked up the dreidel and said, "Hey Freddy, I have a gibble. Look at the little tail."

Freddy told Victor, "No, gimmel means gournisht."

This explanation did not sit too well with Victor. He responded, "I won. I want my money."

Meanwhile, Freddy spun the dreidel again and he hit a shin. With that accomplishment, he promptly shleped away the entire pot.

As Victor looked to me for support, Freddy's mom, Frau Macbeth, charged out and chased both Victor and me away.

Victor took the matter to his court of appeal, his mother.

Mrs. Kondraciuk promptly came on the scene. She had a tête-à-tête with Freddy's mother. The discussion became a bit heated.

The shouting attracted other neighbours to the scene, including my mother.

Mrs. Kondraciuk explained to my mother how Victor had been ripped off playing this Jewish game, first with me a few days ago, and now again.

My mom made a few unkind remarks to Freddy's mother, suggesting that she was an overreaching and inflexible shrew and that her son had indeed ripped off Victor.

Freddy's mother returned the compliment and admonished Victor's mother to keep her eyes on her purse while there were Romanians in the immediate vicinity.

Matters escalated, and Mrs. Kondraciuk demanded that both Freddy and I return all our winnings to Victor.

Freddy and Victor and I were regretting this whole hullabaloo, so we dropped the whole thing and went out to play some street hockey.

Happy Chanukah

HONOURABLE MENTION: "Which way?"

[Sharon Isaacs photo]

Authors describe simple joys of celebrating holiday

By RAHEL MUSLEAH

Just about this time every year, I start to feel like a Maccabee – besieged, not by the Syrian army, but by Chanukah itself. As the 25th of Kislev inches closer, the pressure increases to squeeze more commercialization out of Chanukah than oil from a latke.

So I decided to try to simplify Chanukah and restore its inherent values of freedom, conviction, dedication, hope, continuity, peace, rebuilding, community, family. To help achieve Chanukah's miraculous retransformation, we need help – lots of it! That's why I asked children's authors who have written Chanukah stories to describe the simple joys of their own celebrations and offer some suggestions on how to make Chanukah more meaningful.

Jane Zalben, author of over 40 books, including Pearl's Eight Days of Chanukah (Simon & Schuster), Beni's Family Cookbook for the Jewish Holidays and Papa's Latkes (Holt): "When my children were young, we all fought over who would set up the candles. I still love to pick out the colours of the candles, setting them in the menorah each night and watching them glow in the window.

"My husband, the architect, made a modern menorah out of brass plumbing parts, and another one out of copper tubing. They stand alongside the one from Israel with oil and wicks, and the home-made ones from hair curlers and empty spools of thread.

"A tradition that was a holdover from my parents was 'the search for the presents.' They would leave little notes throughout the house until we finally found the little gift.

"Our traditions have also evolved: One year, we did a latke bake-off, where everyone made their own personal recipe. My husband's blackened Cajun latkes with bits of jalapeno peppers were a hit – and turned into Papa's Latkes.

"Since the children are now 18 and 22, Chanukah has less significance than Passover and Rosh Hashanah, when they return home.

"To me, Chanukah celebrates a group of people who stayed true to

A family project:

Do whatever you do together themselves. That's an important lesson in today's world."

David Adler, author of 150 books, including Chanukah in Chelm (Lothrop), The Kids' Catalog of Jewish Holidays (JPS), and One Yellow Daffodil (Harcourt): "I grew up as one of six children. Along with our parents, our grandmother lived with us. We called her Mutti, which is German for mother. On Chanukah we all lit candles together, made and ate latkes together, and played dreidel together.

"The most fun was watching my brother Eddie and Mutti. Eddie was strict about doing everything the right way, and after a few rounds of dreidel, he often complained, 'Hey, Mutti's cheating.'

"He was right. She did cheat. She cheated to lose. She wanted us, her beloved grandchildren, to win."

Adler says he, his wife and three sons – now 22, 15 and 10 – all have their own chanukiyot, but they light the candles together and follow the family tradition of making latkes together.

"Whatever you do," he advises, "do it together. Instead of just serving latkes, make it a family project."

Eric Kimmel, author of close to 50 books, including Hershel and the Chanukah Goblins, The Chanukah Guest and The Magic Dreidels (Holiday House), also remembers his grandmother, who lived with the family in Brooklyn: "Chanukah was my favourite holiday, bright and warm. My grandma spoke Yiddish and told stories about Galicia as if it were Paradise Lost.

"Her old brass menorah had these two big lions standing on their hind legs holding up the shamash candle. She used old-fashioned orange candles that gleamed off the polished brass and then flowed down into rivers of melted wax.

"I'd gobble down her latkes, made with schmaltz (chicken fat).

"Chanukah is a time to touch base with who we are. It's a roots holiday. But if it's the only Jewish holiday families celebrate in a year, it's meaningless. Copying presents is the Christmas spirit, not the Chanukah spirit. To families I say, 'Nobody can make you do anything you don't want to do. Think about why you're celebrating Chanukah. Is it as a Jewish holiday or as a substitute for Christmas?'"

Joanne Rocklin, author of 20 books, including The Very Best Chanukah Gift (Random House): "Good food and good stories have nourished my family during Chanukah. The power of stories gives us strength from the past, helps us enjoy the present and enables us pass down our tales to future generations.

"Creating rituals that are individual to your particular family reinforces family memories and togetherness. Siblings can craft handmade gifts for each other or write 'promises to share,' like helping with math homework, making the bed, or sharing the top bunk – the favourite – as I did.

"Make latkes from unusual vegetables, like zucchini. Invite neighbours and relatives to enjoy our festival of light, especially non-Jews."

Judye Groner and Madeline Wikler, founders of Kar-Ben Books, which has published over 150 books for Jewish children and their families, including All About Chanukah, which they wrote together: "Get away from the gifts and go towards the mitzvot," Wikler suggests. "It's tough, but try going from getting to giving. One year, for example, my family went to a nursing home on Christmas so others could celebrate their holiday."

Groner tells the story of her son Ben (of Kar-Ben), who moved from parochial school to public high school at the age of 16 and decided to have a Chanukah party: "His guests included an African-American and a boy from India.

"While I served teenage-boy portions of latkes (the house smelled of oil for weeks), he regaled his friends with the history and customs of the holiday, taught them dreidel, and led them in song. I realized the Jewish tradition had become a part of him.

"The amazing thing is that had I said, 'Gee, why not have a Chanukah party and invite your friends,' he never would have agreed. It came from him, spontaneously. So let your kids call the shots. Let the ideas come from them.

"We think of Chanukah for kids – but that doesn't have to be. When the empty nest came, we did a

Examining Jewish life in post Cold War Europe

Citing drastically negative demographic statistics, thanks to a combination of assimilation, falling birth rates and mass emigration from the former Soviet Union, Wasserstein pooh-poohs the idea of a European Jewish Renaissance.

He disputes the European council's claim that three million Jews live in Europe. He puts the total at two million – and falling.

Within a generation or two, Wasserstein glumly predicts, "here and there pockets of haredi Jews, clinging to the tenets of the faith, will no doubt survive – a picturesque remnant like the Amish in the United States."

Jews in Europe, both East and West, have a bitter and frustrated awareness of the looming, unresolved challenges that may hamper Jewish development both within individual communities and in the world at large.

How to deal with the divisions among Orthodox, non-Orthodox and secular Jews? How to make Judaism a relevant choice in today's ideological marketplace? How to approach the high intermarriage rate and the resulting question of who is or can be considered a Jew?

Is it possible to adopt Jewish identity in mid-life? Should intermarriage be seen as a bridge or a barrier? How to confront the crisis in Jewish leadership, on local, national and Europe-wide levels?

How, too, to deal with the changing relationship between Israel and the Diaspora? And how to address the mounting claims by emerging Jewish communities in Eastern Europe to play a full role on the Jewish world stage?

These are, in fact, many of the same questions that face Jews in already democratic, pluralistic, borderless America. But European Jews face them against a different historical and physical backdrop.

Two-thirds of Europe's Jews were killed in the Holocaust, destroying centuries-old communities and traumatizing those Jews who chose to remain – and their children.

The East-West postwar divide effectively and artificially cut off Eastern European Jews from the rest of the Jewish world. Indeed, Jews from these countries – including those who have immigrated to Germany and Israel – often have had to learn more than prayers, holidays, customs and Hebrew. They must also frequently learn the sense of collective memory and connection that even secular Jews in the West tend to grow up with.

Many Jews in former communist Europe maintain what Polish sociologist Pawel Spiewak describes as an "idle" Jewish identity: they are aware of their Jewish identity but, for whatever reason, are not interested in deepening or admitting it.

This is strikingly evident in Hungary, whose Jewish population is estimated at anywhere between 54,000 and 130,000.

Like other countries in the region, Hungary has experienced a visible Jewish revival. Still, only about 6,000 Jews, most of them elderly, formally belong to the Jewish religious community. And only about 20,000 Jews are estimated to have even a tenuous contact with any sort of Jewish activity or institution.

Jews active in community work warn that the momentum of the current Jewish revival may be endangered unless new, younger leaders are prepared to take up the reins and efforts are made to encourage continuing Jewish involvement.

Increasingly, international Jewish organizations are establishing training programs for teachers, lay leaders and fund-raisers.

The European Council of Jewish Communities promotes cross-border contacts, keeps track of new e-mail links and Jewish community Web sites, and helps arrange seminars and other activities – including international singles weekends.

But will this be enough?

Experts say Jewish continuity in former communist Europe may not be achieved until the children of today's emerging Jewish generations come of age.

"It is the young who will decide on the character of the Jewish community," says Spiewak. "The third generation, the children of those who chose to be Jewish" as adults "are the ones who will determine the picture."

grown-up party and had the classic latke-hamantaschen debate. Our guests argued the merits of the two holiday delicacies from the points of view of medicine, physics, economics and art. We laughed and sang a lot, but the latkes – a lo-cal attempt baked on a waffle iron – needed oil to be the real thing!"

As for this writer's memories: "We didn't have latkes in Calcutta, where I was born, but to reflect the miracle of the oil, I often make the classic Indian delicacy of piaju: thinly sliced onions and cilantro coated with chickpea flour and deep-fried.

"My most beautiful image of Chanukah is symbolized by my Indian chanukiyah. Shaped like a Magen David, it has nine brass holders that encircle the red glass cups we fill with oil. As is our custom, after the blessings, we chant Psalm 30, Mizmor shir Chanukat habayit l'David – A Song at the dedication of the house of David.

"As I watch the flames dance and shimmer in the red glasses throughout the evening – for the oil usually burns until midnight – I think of my favourite line from the psalm, addressed to God: You have turned my mourning into dancing."

May Chanukah be a holiday of light, blessing and dancing.

Part of Me, a celebration of Israel

Ottawa-born Jen Arron was the winner of the first Israel Experience Photo Contest, in 1998. Her winning photo was the cover piece of The CJN's Rosh Hashanah Greeting Supplement last year.

All photos for the contest, which was sponsored by several different groups, were taken by 1998 Israel experience student participants.

Arron, who is now pursuing a career in photography, has compiled some of her favourite photographs from the magical trip to Israel in the summer of 1998 in an elegantly published collection entitled Part of Me.

The book combines Arron's uniquely riveting photos along with accompanying poignant entries in her journal.

Part of Me is a celebration of Israel; and of a young woman's discovery of self through the marvelously reflective and refractive lens that Israel offers to our young. It is published by M.O.M. Printing, Ottawa.

Russia to launch Israeli satellite

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Russia has agreed to launch a new military satellite for Israel in the next few months.

The joint venture was given the go-ahead after talks between the Defence Ministry and Moscow, and it has been approved by Prime Minister Ehud Barak. Washington also expressed its understanding, after hearing Israel's reasons for the new collaboration.

Please see related story on page 36

The main motivation for the launch on Russian territory is economic, but the deal also highlights the sluggish development of the Israeli space industry. The delay in the construction of an Israeli launch pad is a result of a major fire at Israel Aircraft Industry's space centre in the spring of 1997, which caused tens of millions of dollars of damage.

Russia can launch satellites more quickly and cheaply than other countries with launch facilities can, and Russian technology is considered very reliable. The Americans have also taken advantage of Russian skill and experience in launching dozens of commercial satellites.

Israel's first military satellite, the Ofek, was launched in Israel in 1995, and it has performed satisfactorily. Ofek's original life expectancy was three years, and it is unclear how long it will continue to function. Within the next three years, the government hopes to rebuild its launching capability, so that the Russian venture will be a one-time deal.

The joint mission with the Russians is being undertaken with the co-operation of El-Op Electro-Optic Industries and an American firm.

A mother calls for justice

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was, as the rabbis noted, a bittersweet occasion.

Chanukah, a joyous holiday in which warmth and light play key roles, was tempered last Sunday by a damp, cold drizzle, and the words of a mother still in shock.

"His life was taken in this park, in this place," said Olga Baranovski of her slain young son, Dmitri. Speaking publicly at a menorah lighting and memorial service for the first time since the Nov. 14 beating death of 15-year-old Matti, Mrs. Baranovski said her son had hoped to become a pediatrician.

"It is difficult to think, and I cannot say what I am feeling," said Mrs. Baranovski, poised but choking back tears, her hands trembling. "But I appreciate that you all came today to remember my son, who was every child's best friend."

More than 500 people gathered under leaden skies near the spot in G. Ross Lord Park in north Toronto where Matti was beaten and kicked to death for refusing to hand over money and cigarettes to young assailants barely older than he was.

Police last week arrested two 16-year-old boys and charged them with second-degree murder. The pair, whose identities are protected under the Young Offenders Act, were remanded in custody. Police say they are looking for one, or possibly two more suspects.

Rabbis from from the Jewish Russian Community Centre joined family, friends, legislators, Jewish communal officials and well-wishers to kindle the lights on a 15-foot menorah erected in memory of the promising Jewish student.

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC To Attend Forum

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress has endorsed, and will take part in, the International Citizens' Forum on War Crimes and Redress, taking place in Tokyo Dec. 10 to 13. The conference, described as a key human rights initiative, is part of ongoing efforts to lead Japan to confront its actions in Asia before and during World War II by acknowledging its role and redressing its victims. Mark Weintraub, chair of CJC's national community relations committee, is slated to deliver the conference's keynote address, on accountability and the importance of memory, and another speech on war crimes redress from a Jewish perspective.

Meeting With Caplan

VANCOUVER — Officials from the Pacific region of Canadian Jewish Congress joined members of the Chinese community in a recent meeting with Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan. Among the issues discussed were language proficiency requirements, student visas, business immigrants, admissibility of war criminals and hatemongers, and the screening process.

Monte Mazin Honored

TORONTO — Longtime local community volunteer Monte Mazin is to receive a Caring Canadian Medal from Governor General Adrienne Clarkson at a Dec. 10 ceremony at Toronto City Hall. Mazin will be one of 129 recipients of the award. For four years, Mazin served as mayor and chair of the Jerusalem Pavilion during the International Caravan. He's also served as chair of GEMS of Hope Inc., which assists people in the developing world.

ISRAEL

Vanunu Transcripts

JERUSALEM — The Israeli daily Yediot Achronot last week published previously secret transcripts from the trial of convicted nuclear spy Mordechai Vanunu. In the documents, Vanunu said he exposed the secrets of Israel's nuclear program to try and force the government to bring the program under tighter supervision.

Unemployment Up

JERUSALEM — Israel's unemployment rate has reached 9.1 percent, putting the number of jobless at about 213,000. The quarterly figures came amid growing criticism of Prime Minister Ehud Barak's handling of the economy. Barak is standing by his campaign pledge to create 300,000 new jobs during the next four years, but said there are no quick fixes.

WORLD

U.S. Aid to Israel

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Bill Clinton last week signed a $385-billion budget bill that includes nearly $3 billion in annual aid to Israel and nearly $2 billion to help Israel and the Palestinian Authority implement last year's Wye accord.

Arafat Visits Russia

MOSCOW — Russian President Boris Yeltsin may travel to the West Bank in January to mark the Eastern Orthodox Christmas, according to Yasser Arafat. The Palestinian Authority president made the comment during a visit to Moscow after speaking with Yeltsin by telephone. Yeltsin cancelled a planned meeting with Arafat because of illness, and Arafat met with Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin instead.

War Criminals Probe

BUENOS AIRES — At least 180 Nazi war criminals settled in Argentina during and after World War II, according to a state panel probing Nazi activities in the country. But even as the panel issued its final report, some of its members said the number is probably much higher and called for more research on the subject.

100-Year-Old Murder

PRAGUE — Czech historians are planning to send a letter to Austria's president requesting that a Czech Jew sentenced to 100 years for ritual murder be posthumously cleared of the charge. Leopold Hilsner was sentenced to death in 1899 by Austria-Hungary for allegedly killing a Christian girl.He was released in 1918.

Death Sentence Demanded

LOS ANGELES — California will buttress its demand for the death penalty in the case of two white supremacists alleged to have murdered a gay couple by citing evidence that the defendants were involved in the June arsons of three Sacramento synagogues.

Jewish Youths Blamed

PARIS — The Paris office of the U.S.-based Jews for Jesus movement was attacked recently, apparently by Jewish youths who spray-painted the words "Never Again" and "Israel Lives" on the walls of the office. The director of the office said seven young men, who identified themselves as members of the New Jewish Order, threatened to kill one of the group's employees. Police said the youths are part of Betar, a Zionist youth movement.

Stonemason Who Helped Jews Victimized

BERLIN — Neo-Nazi vandals have reportedly victimized the stonemason who recently repaired Berlin's vandalized Jewish cemetery for free.

After the mason received telephone death threats, 150 gravestones in his eastern Berlin warehouse were destroyed, allegedly by neo-Nazi vandals. A public appeal is trying to help compensate him for his loss of nearly $40,000 (US).

In October, the stonemason, who has asked that his name not be used, offered to repair the damage to 103 Jewish gravestones that had been vandalized on Oct. 3, the anniversary of Germany's reunification.

He has reportedly helped in similar situations over the years.

The Jewish community held a dinner in his honor Nov. 24 after the repair of the stones in Berlin's Weissensee Jewish Cemetery was complete.

The mason kept quiet about the attack out of fear, said the manager of a foundation that has established a bank account for donations.

CJC calls for resolution on school funding issue

Regional plenary held in Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario and Canadian governments should move quickly to implement a United Nations ruling calling for an end to discrimination in educational funding against Jewish and other independent religious schools.

This was the message of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region chair Keith Landy at a luncheon Nov. 28 celebrating the 30th triennial plenary of CJC, Ontario region.

"Mr. Premier [Mike Harris] and Mr. Prime Minister [Jean Chrétien], we are waiting," said Landy.

"Canada has 90 days to report back [to the UN]," he said. "Eight times previously Canada has been called to account and eight times it has been corrected. I believe the federal government should [respond]."

Sitting beside Ontario Attorney General Jim Flaherty, Landy criticized "the intransigent position" of Premier Harris in opposing the funding of Jewish day schools.

An extension of health services to independent schools would cost the Ontario government an "insignificant amount" and affect only three percent of the Ontario student body, Landy said.

"There are signs that the premier is listening, and health services [would be] just the beginning. We are going to battle on for justice," Landy concluded.

The provinces also want tougher legislation from the federal government on hate crimes, Flaherty said.

"We are not passive or indifferent on this. We have 15 specially trained crown prosecutors on hate crime. We will not hesitate to authorize prosecutions."

Break-ins, which are especially serious for people living alone and for the elderly, and violent youth crime are high on the agenda of the government, Flaherty said.

The attorney general said the CJC is making Ontario a better place through its pursuit of justice.

A brief videotaped greeting to the plenary from Harris was shown.

The previous evening, in the opening session, plenary chair Elaine Todres welcomed to the opening forum at the Sephardic Kehila Centre a crowd of 550, the largest meeting in the history of the plenary.

In his address at the forum, CJC national president Moshe Ronen touched on several issues Congress is currently following.

Ronen said CJC will soon be meeting with Phil Fontaine, grand chief of the Assembly of First Nations, to discuss an alliance between Congress and native groups in Canada.

He also announced that Premier Pat Binns of Prince Edward Island told him recently that P.E.I. will enact legislation similar to that in Ontario, honouring Yom Hashoah day.

Turning to the topic of Israel, he declared: "Jerusalem is the united capital of Israel forever. On this subject our government needs to hear an unequivocal voice. Our support for Israel remains unshakable."

Human rights remains the centrepiece of CJC policy, he concluded.

Using a town-hall, question and answer format at the plenary opening, several speakers discussed the issue of how the media handles Jewish news.

Ronen gave an illustration of how difficult it is for the media to handle news about Israel. He said a CNN correspondent stuck a microphone in front of an Israeli citizen and asked him to sum up the situation in Israel in one word.

"Good," the Israeli replied.

"And if I had asked you to use two words?"

"Not good," was the reply.

In answer to a question from the floor, CBC TV senior reporter Joe Schlesinger said, "Israel is getting balanced and fair treatment from the media."

Although moderator Hana Gartner did not ask all the other panelists to reply, broadcaster Evan Solomon disagreed with Schlesinger: "Newspapers are biased and on Israel you need to read widely," Solomon said.

Earlier, Ezra Levant, an editorial writer for the National Post, said his newspaper is the only one giving fair coverage to Israel. (His newspaper is owned by Conrad Black, owner of The Jerusalem Post).

Despite his general feeling that the media are fair, Schlesinger did say the media tend to favour the underdog and see Israel upon the Palestinians as the underdogs. This situation has changed since 1967, he said. "The media is dealing with the facts as they see them today."

Referring to poster-size photocopies of stories in the national media concerning incidents of anti-Semitism and how the CJC has fought injustice, including anti-Semitism, Levant called the incidents "trumped up charges" and

From the editor's desk

They dared dream and act

I recently had the extraordinary good fortune to be the guest of the Israeli Ministry of Tourism and El Al Airlines for a six-day visit to Israel.

Six days, of course, is far too short a period of time for a visit to Israel. There is simply too much to see, to touch and to feel in that geographically tiny though historically, culturally and spiritually vast country.

But an opportunity to visit Israel, any opportunity, is too important to let slip away. And this opportunity specifically, with the hospitality of the Ministry of Tourism generously placed at my service, was not to be missed.

The ministry had arranged an itinerary of significant "tourist sites" for me, customized to accommodate my personal interests and preferences. In addition, I had the benefit of a guide whose insights and elaborations at each site helped elevate the experience from one of "mere" tourism and enjoyment to one of learning and wonder.

Jerusalem and its environs were the main focus of my activities.

Jerusalem has a decidedly different "feel" than any other city. Its topography, architecture, colours and sounds are stirring. Unless the visitor's senses have been irremediably dulled into a thick and unfeeling callus, the sensations come alive.

Jerusalem's unique hold on history and on the people struggling to understand that history, can help the wide-eyed tourist to better grasp life's true, gift-like immensity.

Jerusalem's streets are a hilly thoroughfare of vastly varied peoples, some hurrying, some ambling to their respective private destinations, all of them though the conjoining individual threads in the rough, smooth, colourful, bland, refined, lowly texture of the fabulous human tapestry that sets Jerusalem apart. For it is, indeed, set apart from all other cities.

In the next three issues I will record some of the entries from my notebook of my six-day visit.

* * *

Israeli is no longer a "pioneer" society in the sense that it once was. When the peace negotiations with the Palestinians are finally completed and the difficult question of borders resolved, the nature of Israel's physical shape will have been settled. Of course the task of securing and protecting that shape will always remain.

Israel, today, is a society in transition from one whose dominant policy ethos was always foreign affairs, defence and security, to one increasingly concerned with domestic and social policy.

But despite the transition, despite the weighty influence being exerted upon all aspects of society's ebb, flow and turbulence by the country's rapidly advancing science, there are still many examples of the "older" more familiar kind of pioneers.

These were people who not only dared to dream the Zionist dream, but who dared, more importantly, to act upon it as well. These were people who came from far away places to try to help build this place into a homeland that they imagined could be and hoped would be, one day, the very best place on earth.

During my brief six days, I met a number of such "familiar" pioneers. Whether or not Israel has yet become the very best place on earth that they dreamed it could be, is quite irrelevant.

What matters most, at this stage in the life of the young 51-year-old nation, is that the pioneers are still striving toward their hope.

I mention only four:

• Tsion Ben David is the director of the North America and International Special Missions desk of the Ministry of Tourism. He came to Israel in 1949 from the city of his birth, Bombay in India.

He was one of a family of 11 that, in its entirety, though in stages, settled in Israel.

• Nachman Klieman, spokesperson and public relations manager of El Al Airlines, was born in Chicago. Along with his wife and two children, he moved to Israel 22 years ago. Two more children were born in Israel.

• Herb (Haim) Harris, a docent at the Israel Museum, was born in Brooklyn but raised in Philadelphia. He came to Israel in his early 20s in 1953, a geologist looking for oil. Like a character in a Leon Uris novel, he fell in love with Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion's secretary, a fifth-generation sabra. Luckily for Herb, she fell in love with him too.

Their two children were born in Israel, although Herb's work took him for stretches at a time to Australia and the United States. They returned for good in 1988.

• Brian Denn, spokesperson for Kibbutz Ein Gedi, the oasis in the Negev Desert, near the receding shoreline of the Dead Sea, was born just outside Houston, Tex. He has lived in Israel for 25 years.

• Dr. Sonia Chesnya arrived in Israel from the former Soviet Union nearly 10 years ago. She is the official guide at Independence Hall in Tel Aviv, explaining every nuance and detail of the epoch-making ceremony on that Sabbath eve of May 14, 1948, when David Ben-Gurion declared the creation of the State of Israel. In speaking of that occasion, 51 years ago, she wipes away the tears from her eyes.

All four are pioneers; all four are living examples, still, of inspiration and courage MBD

Synagogues unite to create kosher food bank

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last spring, Rabbi Steven Saltzman gave a sermon that became the catalyst for a multi-synagogue kosher food bank project.

As Claudette Edghill, chair of Adath Israel Congregation's chesed committee, recalls, the rabbi talked about the possibility of a collaborative effort among synagogues to collect food for the needy.

A fellow congregant approached Edghill after services to say, "That's a wonderful idea."

Edghill agreed. "Let's do it," she said.

The woman had told her about a young Jewish woman who went to a food bank after losing her job.

"That touched my heart," Edghill said. "We thought we should do something for the community, so if [people] need kosher food, they have it."

The result is the Intersynagogue Kosher Food Bank, with partner congregations Adath Israel, Beth Tikvah, Beth Torah, Beth Tzedec, Beth Sholom Synagogue, Pride of Israel Synagogue and Temple Sinai.

Each congregation collects specific categories of kosher food items – such as canned goods, pasta and rice, or breakfast foods – which are used to stock the actual food banks, located at Pride of Israel in the north part of the city and at Beth Sholom, farther south on Eglinton Avenue West.

Cash donations, used to purchase perishable items such as chickens (currently available at the northern looking for ways to help," she said.

Before the project was conceived, the Pride of Israel already had a kosher food bank, established by Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, predecessor of the synagogue's current spiritual leader, Rabbi Robert Rhodes. Rabbi Flanzraich, now the spiritual leader of Beth Sholom, was motivated to start the food bank after receiving numerous requests for money to buy food for Jewish people in need.

When Edghill brought the proposed inter-synagogue project to Rabbi Flanzraich's attention, he felt it was an "ideal project" for Beth Sholom, which, like Adath Israel, has an active chesed committee.

In fact, plans were already under way to establish Beth Sholom's own food bank.

Since it became a reality about three months ago, the food bank has served about 25 to 30 people a week, said Rabbi Flanzraich in a phone interview.

Food is stored in cabinets built specifically for that purpose, and volunteers pre-package the food.

The new project is "exciting," said Rabbi Flanzraich. "What we did at the Pride was a very strong small step, and I think this is a profound large step. I would love to see it become a model duplicated by other Canadian communities."

Kosher food bank hours are:
• Beth Sholom Synagogue, 1445 Eglinton Ave. W., Monday to Thursday, 10:00 to 11:30 a.m. and 1:30 to 3:30 p.m., Friday, 10:00 to 11:30 a.m.
• Pride of Israel Synagogue, 59 Lissom Cres., Monday to Thursday 9:30 to 11:30 a.m. and 1:30 to 3:30 p.m., Friday 9:30 to 11:30 a.m.

said Jews are enjoying a safe life in Canada today.

"We can cause anti-Semitism to disappear by telling the truth," Levant said.

Susan Cole, an associate editor of NOW magazine, and Schlesinger said the University of Toronto should be blamed for allowing controversial speakers such as British author David Icke to speak at the university, as it did in October.

At one point, Cole said she doubted that journalists are truly objective.

The Bank of Montreal was thanked for sponsoring the plenary and George Bothwell, executive vice-president, was given a gift in appreciation.

Ben Kayfetz, former CJC national director of community relations, was given the first David Satok Award in honour of Satok, a late CJC officer who was known for his dissenting opinions.

Trio hopes to create Jewish museum in Toronto

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

From left: Joel Slan, Bonnie Lawrence Shear and Bill Draimin.

TORONTO — For nearly five years, three Torontonians, none with any professional experience with museums, have been quietly working towards the goal of establishing a Jewish museum in Toronto.

They don't know where it will be located, what it will contain, or how much it will cost. All they know for sure is that Toronto, with its sizeable Jewish community of about 175,000, must have one.

"The concept is not to simply accumulate artifacts," says Bill Draimin, a principle in Draimin, Fine, a St. Clair Avenue. law firm. "We aren't interested in getting European candlesticks and Torah coverings.

"We believe what happened to the Jews here is interesting and important. We want to tell the stories of the local Jewish community."

There are nearly 50 Jewish museums in the United States, says Bonnie Lawrence Shear, a Toronto-area property manager who has long felt the need for a Jewish museum here. Toronto's Jewish community, she notes, consists of Jews from many countries around the world and the community is the largest in Canada and one of the top 10 largest in North America.

"We would like a world-class museum, and ideally, we want it on a downtown site," says Shear, who was initially attracted to the old Mount Sinai Hospital building on Yorkville Avenue until she discovered it came with a price tag of $34 million.

Shear, Draimin and Joel Slan, a Toronto-area real estate investor, have explored numerous other would-be sites for the institution they hope to establish. Potential locations have included the Baycrest Hospital which was dismissed as unsuitable; a building on College Street in the Kensington Market area; another building under construction on Bloor Street, the University Street Courthouse, the Royal Ontario Museum and the Bloor Street Jewish Community Centre.

The trio initiated lengthy discussions with the ROM but did not achieve a memorandum of understanding. The JCC site, they say, remains an option.

To further the project, they have consulted an impressive list of historians, archivists and other experts, including Michael Marrus, Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, Irving Abella, Sheldon Godfrey, Stephen Speisman and architect Moshe Safdie.

According to Slan, museum consultant Shaiko Wineberg, creator of the concept of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, was a fundamental guiding light. "You must tell a story – that's what people are interested in," Wineberg told them. "You can't just put things out on a shelf."

Although they have collectively visited many Jewish museums internationally, they haven't yet found a model for the institution they envision. "None of the museums we've seen come close to what we want," Slan says.

Further, he acknowledges that the group has focused almost entirely to date on finding an appropriate location. "Maybe we've been putting the cart before the horse." He says it may be time to concentrate on what shape the museum exhibits would likely take.

According to a five-page prospectus, the museum will highlight the political upheavals that brought Jewish immigrants here from the Old Country, present a panorama of Jewish life in Ontario, house an archival and genealogical centre, and provide space and resources for Jewish artists, actors, storytellers and writers. Operating in a downtown location, it would be a draw for residents and tourists, both Jewish and non-Jewish.

Many people have stories from their family history that would be suitable for the museum, Shear says. "We went to one woman for funding, and she said, 'Why should I give money to a museum when there are so many hospitals needing funding?'

"For a moment we were feeling dismayed, but then she began showing us some pictures on her wall and telling family stories. We said, 'This is what we're talking about. This is exactly what the museum would be all about.'"

Shear, Slan and Draimin also tell interesting family tales entwined with local history. Shear's father, for example, ran the old Colonial Tavern on Yonge Street and was instrumental in the building of Scarborough General Hospital.

Gracing the wall of Draimin's office is a large oil portrait of his great-uncle, Samuel King (1867-1963), the first Jewish lawyer in Ontario. Draimin's grandmother was the first woman to graduate from the University of Toronto; his grandfather, the first president of Goel Tzedec Synagogue.

"There are many old members of the community with interesting stories to tell, but they're getting older every day," Shear says. "This is why we need the museum."

UIA Federations' Yagoda stresses Zionism's importance

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Being a Zionist is a lifelong commitment, says the deputy director general of UIA Federations Canada which is based in Jerusalem.

"Zionism is not a profession; it is not something from which you can retire. It is a story that took 2,000 years to elaborate. We have to be happy to continue on with it," said Victor Yagoda at a recent talk at Beth Habonim, sponsored by UJA Federation.

Citing statistics that prove "why I have to remain a Zionist," Yagoda, who was born and raised in Mexico, said that less than 50 percent of the world's Jews live in Israel. "The balance of the Jews are dispersed [far and wide].

"Of the seven million Palestinians in the world, however, 93 percent live in the Middle East, and 2½ million Israeli Arabs live in Israel. We have to be strong Zionists so we do not feel outnumbered."

Victor Yagoda

The first time he travelled to Israel from Mexico, he said, he took a bus to New York, and a boat from there to Israel. "I spent 20 days on the boat, and the morning I knew we would dock at Haifa, I stood on the deck.

"This may sound like a cliché, but one of the strongest moments of my life, occurred when I glimpsed Mount Carmel. I knew then that eventually, I would make aliyah."

Currently, he says, Israel stands at the centre of the Jewish world. "At the first Zionist congress in Europe in 1897, though, only two members came from North America and Palestine. Most members came from eastern and central Europe.

"Zionism as a movement, started there. The heart of the Jewish frontier at the turn of the last century was in Europe."

The heart of the Jewish world is now in North America and Europe, he said, "and we are teaching them what they taught us about 100 years ago.

"We are also teaching them about Zionism. The first Zionists came from Odessa, and now we are helping them return to Zionism. The Jewish frontier is always changing."

In 1988, he said, about 12,000 Jews immigrated to Israel, and in 1989, that number doubled. "In 1990, immigration rose to 200,000 people, and the country accepted them and was able to cope. If that is not Zionism, than I do not know what is.

"It is hard to be [in the Diaspora] and fully understand that we are still dealing with Jewish refugees. In the former Soviet Union we help bring Jewish life to children who will eventually come to Israel," said Yagoda.

He feels strongly, he said, that in the next 12 to 24 months, there will be major changes in the Israeli political process. "I have no doubt, that peace with Syria is a done deal. So many things lead us to it."

Syrian President Hafez al-Assad wants peace, and Israeli President Ehud Barak was dealing with Syria before he was elected, said Yagoda, so he is already sold on the possibility. "A peace treaty with Syria will cost us the last inch of territory, but I feel that people are ready for it to go forward.

"About 57 percent of the people in the Golan Heights voted for Barak, and that is a strong sign that people want peace.

"If we have peace with Syria, that means we will have peace with Lebanon. If we can have peace with Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, we will be in a stronger position to address the more problematic areas [of the Arab world."]

Living in the Diaspora, he said, "we see some people celebrate Passover, and see others going about their normal day-to-day business on that holiday.

"In Israel, there is a rush hour going to the seder. We all go, because we are telling the story of our people going to the Promised Land. If we teach our children what it is all about, hopefully they will remain Zionists."

Seeking sound tax policy

This newspaper reported last week that the Toronto-based Press Foundation is appealing the decision by Revenue Canada, now Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA), to revoke the organization's status under the Income Tax Act as a registered charity.

There were, apparently, a number of reasons for the CCRA's decision. The chief reason, however, was its ruling that the activities of the foundation, namely, sending funds to institutions for religious, health, education or social services in the West Bank, violated Canadian public policy. In this case, according to the CCRA, the policy violated was that of Canada's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which regards Israel's "occupation" of the territories beyond the 1967 ceasefire lines as illegal, and therefore any Jewish communities in the West Bank also as illegal. Sending financial aid to the institutions that operate in these communities, the CCRA reasoned, amounted to supporting the infrastructure of these "illegal" communities and was thus an ineligible activity for a registered charity

CCRA's policy is deeply troubling.

Without referring to the particulars of the Press Foundation case, the broad application by CCRA of the foreign affairs position regarding the June '67 ceasefire lines is simply wrong.

It is wrong on its merits as unsound Canadian tax policy.

The sole issue that CCRA should consider is the nature of the activity for which funds are collected. Are the activities in and of themselves charitable? The common law stretches back hundreds of years, precisely defining activities that do fall within the definition of "charitable purposes." That definition has been enshrined in statute and it has always included activities that are religious, educational, health or social in their essence. That the CCRA has subordinated in importance the nature of the charitable activity to the location of the activity in determining its tax policy effectively imposes foreign policy as the pre-eminent determinant of tax policy.

Moreover, and perhaps more troubling, the CCRA policy is wrong in the manner by which it is being applied. It functionally discriminates against Jewish Canadians who support obviously and unequivocally charitable activities in the West Bank.

There are no cases of CCRA disqualifying charitable donations by non-Jewish Canadians to institutions in the West Bank for charitable purposes.

Would CCRA disqualify donations to a clearly charitable institution in Kuwait? Probably not. And yet, does not Kuwait's recent refusal to extend to women the right to vote or to hold public office offend Canadian public policy? Indeed, could there possibly be a more patently offensive violation of Canadian public policy?

Canadians have a right to expect that their national tax policy will be formulated on the basis of sound public policy and not upon questionable foreign policy decisions. Surely such public policy should enable Canadians to assist and support bona fide charitable activities. And to determine what constitutes a bona fide charitable activity, the nature of the activity itself should govern, rather than the ill-conceived, legally questionable, morally ambiguous foreign policy decisions by the CCRA or any other arm of the Canadian government regarding an offshore territorial dispute in which the parties themselves are diligently striving towards agreement.

Another Polish view

Re: "No Polish labour camps" by Hanna Sokolski, (CJN, Nov. 25).

Upon learning that the unfortunate phrase "Polish labour camps" found its way into the otherwise excellent booklet prepared for the Holocaust Education Week by the Holocaust week education committee, the National Executive Board of the Canadian Polish Congress wrote a letter to Bernie Farber, executive director of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. We received a reply the following day, and accepted the explanation that this was a proofreading error, as well as the apology for the error.

It is not the policy of the Canadian Polish Congress to ascribe ill will or intentional publication of erroneous information to the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) nor to blame the entire community for an oversight by the proofreader.

The CJC is to be commended for organizing the Holocaust Education Week, especially in view of recent events (such as the beating of an elderly Jewish man or the desecration of a Jewish cemetery), which prove that bigotry and hate unfortunately still exist.

Refutes Sokolski letter

Hanna Sokolski of the Canadian Polish Congress, Toronto District, seems to misunderstand the relationship of Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto to Holocaust Education Week. (CJN, Nov. 25)

While we are proud to be a participant (some 36 churches took part this year), we are not responsible for programs other than our own. The event in question did not take place under our auspices and her complaint should properly have been addressed to the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation.

The churches that participate in Holocaust Education Week do so out of solidarity with our Jewish neighbours and because we recognize that centuries of anti-Jewish polemic in the churches helped contribute to a climate in which the Holocaust could take place. The recent desecration of a Jewish cemetery and a monument to victims of the Holocaust are evidence of the persistence of anti-Semitism in our society. I only hope that today those in the Jewish community know that they do not stand alone.

Our aim is not to point the finger at any nation or people but to encourage individuals to look within themselves and their society to eradicate any and all forms or racism and prejudice.

Question for Sokolski

Re: Hanna Sokolski's letter stating her dismay at the Toronto Jewish community as "to allege that the Poles were in any way responsible for the Holocaust is an outrage."

As a child of camp survivors, I have one question for Sokolski: How many Poles were handed over to the Nazis by the Jews?

Likes Gidi Koren's column

Re: "Koren is anti-Israel." (CJN, Nov. 18)

I wish to take exception to Pnina Brandes' assessment that Gidi Koren "takes every opportunity to defame" Israel.

Sweeping bad images under the rug is not what I would expect from a reporter who, albeit anecdotally, reports current events in Israel. Religious coercion, land-for-life zealots, political corruption and deaths on the highways are all part of the Israeli landscape.

Brandes' request amounts to censorship. The concept that only good things should be said about Israel is probably one of the principal factors contributing to the democratic problems of Israel today. Gone are the days of setting artificial (and fictitious) standards that are out of touch with reality. In my opinion, facing the truth is eventually the easier way to deal with it.

To Koren I say, Kol hakavod, your column is informative and entertaining. Nothing less should be tolerated.

The quality of Jews

I came out of Hungary many years ago, and the help that we received from our people was something extraordinary. Words cannot possibly express it. I came to this land of miracles.

After we finished our one-year contract with the government cutting pulp wood, I came to Montreal. It must be known to everyone what a reception we got! A group of people were waiting for us – our newly acquired family. We were housed in a downtown hotel for the night. The next day, we visited the Jewish Agency on Jeanne Mance Street. We were given some money, the names of families to stay with, members of the Jewish community.

I would be happy to have the current generation hear about this story, to make them aware of what their parents and grandparents have done. They must be educated to know the quality of our people.

Two stories

Auschwitz Chanukah spoon

By I.I. COHEN
Special to The CJN

One of the items I smuggled out of Auschwitz, when the Nazis moved me into Camp Number Eight – a quarantine camp, for those suspected of carrying typhus – was my spoon. It wasn't much, but it was mine – and it would come to play an important role in my Jewish life and in those of some of the 500 or so other prisoners there.

There were no labour details in this new camp, but we inmates were ordered to help in its construction, which was still under way. Having had some experience in the Lodz ghetto as a mechanic, I helped the electrical technician install the camp's lighting.

With my new access to tools, I brought my spoon to work and filed down its handle, making it into a sharp knife. Now I could use it both to eat my soup and to cut my bread. This was useful because we would often receive one chunk of bread to divide among two or three people, and without a knife it was difficult to apportion the bread fairly. Now I was regularly called upon to use my spoon-knife to help avoid disputes and maintain relative peace among the prisoners.

When winter came, though, my spoon became involved in an additional mitzvah. By then, we had been transferred to Camp Number Four in Kaufering, a camp more similar to Auschwitz in its daily ordeals. Despite the horrendous hardships we suffered daily, however, we tried whenever possible to remember to do a mitzvah and to maintain a self-image as God-fearing Jews, despite all the dangers that involved.

'We must discover a way of doing the mitzvah'

Having always kept mental track of the calendar, I knew when Chanukah had arrived. During a few minutes' rest break, a group of inmates and I began to reminisce about how, back home before the war, our fathers would light their menorahs with such fervour and joy. We remembered how we could never seem to get our fill of watching the flames sparkling like stars, how we basked in their warm, special glow, how they seemed to imbue us with a special sanctity.

And then we got to thinking about the origins of Chanukah, about the war of the Hasmoneans against their Greek tormentors who were intent on erasing Judaism from Jewish hearts. We remembered how God helped them to fight their enemy, enabling them to freely observe the Torah.

And then we looked around ourselves. Here we were, in a camp where our lives were constantly in danger, where we were considered sub-human and where it was virtually impossible to observe the most basic practices of Judaism. How happy we would be, we mused, if only we could light Chanukah candles.

While we talked and dreamed, we were all suddenly struck, as if at once, by the same resolution: We simply must discover a way of doing the seasonal mitzvah.

One fellow offered a small bit of margarine he had saved from his daily ration. That could serve as our oil. And wicks? We began to unravel threads from our uniforms.

What, though, could be our menorah? I took out my spoon, and within moments, we were lighting the Chanukah "candle," reciting the blessings of Lehadlik Ner, She'asah Nissim and Shehechianu. We all stood around entranced, transfixed, each immersed in his own thoughts of Chanukahs gone by.

And our unusual Chanukah menorah kindled in us a glimmer of hope. As we recited the blessing about the miracles God had performed for our forefathers "in those days," but also "at this time," we well understood that the only thing that could save us would be a miracle – a nes gadol.

Other Jews stood near us watching the flame of the Chanukah candle. I am certain that none of us who survived will ever be able to forget that luminous moment in the darkness of our concentration camp lives.

The celebrated Viennese psychiatrist Dr. Viktor Frankl, who was himself, incidentally, an inmate of Kaufering, asserted in his book Man's Search for a Meaning that, to survive the concentration camps, a person had to have something larger to live for. Those with goals had a better chance to remain alive.

We religious Jews in the camps were certainly good examples of that phenomenon, living for our Sabbaths, our Jewish holidays and our daily recognition that there is an Almighty, whether or not we could ever fathom His ways. I often felt that our convictions helped us cling to life when others sank to the depths of despair.

And today, I am overwhelmed at times with gratitude to God for my personal miracle, my survival, especially when I am surrounded by the children and grandchildren He has granted me, all of whom are committed to the observance and study of the Torah. And the gratitude comes rushing in as well every winter, when I light my menorah – a real one today – and, as I always do, I remember my Auschwitz spoon Chanukah.

I.I. Cohen, a Polish-born survivor of three concentration camps, lives in Toronto, where he is writing a book about his wartime experiences, from which the above is excerpted.

An Iranian Chanukah

By SHAHNAZ KEYPOUR

Chanukah is Chanukah no matter what part of the world we Jews are living in. We all light the chanukiyah and say the same brachot.

But there can be differences in some of the traditions surrounding the holiday. In food for instance.

Iranian Jews have some different customs for every festival, and chanukah is not an exception.

The festival of Chanukah coincides approximately with the Iranian winter festival called Shabeh Yalda, which dates back to Zoroastrianism and celebrates the rebirth of the sun.

When I was a child living in Iran, we used to keep warm at home in the winter by sitting on large cushions around a korsi – a low, square table covered with a thick blanket hanging over the sides and large enough to cover us up to the shoulders. A brazier full of burning coal was placed under the table. At meal times, a napkin was spread over the blanket and the korsi was used as a table.

On Chanukah nights, after lighting the candles and singing the prayers, we used to take our seats around the korsi and eat fruits such as pomegranates, persimmons, quinces, apples, oranges, mandarins, and a combination of dried fruit and nuts. These included figs, dates, apricots, prunes, raisins, pistachios, almonds, cashews, roasted watermelon seeds and squash.

Latkes are not part of the tradition of Iranian Jews. As an oily food, many eat a variety of omelettes called kukus in Persian. Kukus absorb a lot of oil because they are very thick. They contain a lot of herbs (kuku sabzi), dill (kuku shevid), and vegetables – eggplant (kuku badernjan), spinach (kuku wsphenaj), zucchini (kuku kadu), or green beans (kuku lubia sabz).

The kukus would be served with rice dishes and stews along with an assortment of fresh sabzis (herbs) and vegetables such as radishes, green onions, mint, basil, tarragon, and savory. As a side dish, torshi was served. Torshi, as it is also known in other cultures, is a mixture of vegetables and spices preserved in vinegar.

On Chanukah nights, we often had guests. Most of the time, they were members of the extended family. The elders would often share stories with the rest of us.

Frequently, a family member who was known for having a good voice would be asked to sing classical Iranian songs. Others would join in with whatever songs they could sing or whatever instruments they could play; this often also led to dancing.

Of course, all this while the traditional samovar would be contributing its own gurgle to our joy.

Since Iran is an Islamic country, we did not have to compete with Christmas. We did not have the tradition of gift giving either. On the other hand, we kept all our religious celebrations rather private and quiet; no chanukiyah was visible through our windows.

Another fond memory that comes to my mind is that of in-school celebrations of Chanukah. The Jewish day schools were supported by two organizations. Some received subsidies from the American Jewish Joint Committee; others depended on the Alliance Israélite Universelle. I went to an AJC school called Ganje Danesh (Treasure of Knowledge).

Every year for Chanukah, we used to put on plays which were mostly made of Hebrew songs and Israeli dances. It was a big event and families were invited to attend. Weeks before Chanukah, several students volunteered to stay after school to build a stage, make costumes, design and paint the sets, and rehearse for the presentation. There was a lot of fun in this collective activity under our teachers' supervision.

Now after 30-some years, around Chanukah time I teach the same songs to my students at the London Community Hebrew Day School and at the Or Shalom Talmud Torah. It is an experience of nostalgia mixed with gratefulness.

Growing up in Iran always had challenges and limitations for a Jew. But we kept our faith and practised our traditions while sharing in and enjoying many aspects of Iranian culture.

Persian poetry, music, arts and crafts, Persian cuisine, Persian wisdom mixed with a sense of humour, Persian family values, Persian hospitality and politeness – all these are part and parcel of our heritage no matter where we live.

The history of Iranian Jews has had its ups and downs. May this festival of lights bring geulah to all Jews wherever they are in distress and nes gadol for the freedom of those 13 Iranian Jews who are unjustly being kept imprisoned.

Shahnaz Keypour is a teacher in London, Ont., where she lives with her husband, David, and their three children.

Notes from a trip to Germany

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The trip, my first since 1994, when I had delivered the convocation address at my Alma Mater, Humboldt University in Berlin, also had a personal significance. Germany's premier publisher, Bertelsmann, was launching the first volume of my Torah Commentary, on whose rendition into German I had worked for the last two years with a team of translators. The book is splendidly designed, quite differently from the English original. The Hebrew text stands out and is highly readable.

There is a significant demand for Jewish literature in the new Germany, a demand that stems from both Jews and non-Jews. Across the street from my hotel was a bookstore that carried many Jewish books. I took my Torah Commentary there, ready to acquaint the owners with a book they might wish to sell.

They took one look at it and said, "We've already got it at the fair and have it on the shelf."

"Who buys your Jewish books?" I asked.

The answer came quickly: "A broad spectrum of the population. I cannot identify them, they represent the average reader."

My little hotel was located in a part of Munich which, incidentally, is also the artistic capital of the nation. Famous museums were within walking distance, and large academic buildings in a park-like setting make this quarter of the city especially attractive.

No wonder this was the place where Hitler and his party first began to rule the Reich. It gave me pleasure to think that the Fuehrer must be whirling in his grave (although in fact he had none), to see Jews holding a religious convocation in the very place where he had planned to destroy our people.

Munich is a bustling city. Traffic proceeds at top speed, but to me the greatest danger for a visitor is not in the streets but on the sidewalks – reserved in part for broad bicycle lanes. Here, the cyclists equal the speed of the automobiles, and here the danger of being run over is perhaps as great as anywhere else in the city.

I noted, incidentally, that the cyclists stopped at red lights like the drivers of automobiles – quite in contrast to what I see around me in Toronto. Also, pedestrians waited for green lights – even in streets that were fairly empty of vehicles – an example, a friend of mine said, of the meticulous adherence to rules and regulations practised in this country.

It was a very brief visit, lasting less than a week, but in a personal way it was a return to my youth. This was the land in which I had spent my youth and which I had to leave.

Now a very different political and cultural climate has welcomed my work on elucidating Torah, and the country's prime publishing house has seen fit to make it available to the public.

In a way a circle has been closed. The terrible past can never be erased, but the emergence of a new Germany is a reality.

Alice doesn't live there anymore

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Some experiences are transfiguring: moonrise over the earth as seen from space; Bach's music; childbirth. Add to this the first time one hears a Jewish feminist who loves her Jewishness, observes Halachah, and is a true revolutionary. Prof. Alice Shalvi is that Jewish feminist, and to hear her speak is just that kind of transforming experience.

When I first heard Shalvi at a federation general assembly, she was teaching English literature at Hebrew University. She was introduced as an Orthodox woman and a feminist, at a time when we had difficulty putting these two categories together. Her obvious love of Torah and her firm commitment to equality for women was riveting, as she urged halachically based advocacy for women. Especially outspoken on the issue of agunot, she taught important lessons for our developing Jewish feminism.

Recently I heard her again speaking in our Conservative shul, an egalitarian congregation where women are counted in a minyan, permitted to lead services and chant from the Torah. We have come a long way – what message does Shalvi have for us now?

Not surprisingly, this incredible woman has moved beyond us to point out new directions. She has "crossed the floor" – proclaimed herself affiliated with the Conservative movement and taken the position of rector of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies, where programs combine intensive study of Jewish text and tradition with the study of women in Judaism, or more properly, gender studies.

"Feminism," she proclaims, "is the only permanent and beneficial revolutionary idea of the 20th century. It has had a profound effect on the way women view themselves, are viewed, and perceive their roles in society." Communism and Nazism, she points out, have died. Feminism, in an ever-changing configuration, continues to affect every facet of society.

Not content with that bombshell, she adds that for Jewish women there are two modes of feminist expression. One is the liberal egalitarian, a trend that aims to achieve for women equality of status and reward. Women do what men do and receive the same recognition, monetary, as well as personal.

The second, more radical, she calls transformational feminism: This is a feminism that brings deep structural changes in society. Societal gender roles are abandoned. Women bring their feminine insights to bear on society and social practice. Men assume more "caring" roles.

Egalitarian feminism is illustrated by the daughters of Tzelophchad, who went to Moses and pointed out that the rules of inheritance he had propagated meant they would lose their inheritance, their father's offspring being only female. Moses was then enjoined by God to restate the rules to allow women in these circumstances to inherit, thus striking one small blow for legal equality. Today this kind of reformation would be exemplified by Orthodox women studying Talmud, thus assuring them equality of access to every sacred Jewish text.

Transformational feminism goes beyond access. It calls upon Judaism to create new ceremonies, new midrashim and a new language, to express our thoughts. Books like Reading Ruth, The Book of Blessings and Standing Again at Sinai seek to recover the voices of women within the texts.

The revival of Rosh Chodesh as a women's holiday is one instance. Developing ceremonies for women's rites of passage is another. These ceremonies would recognize the cycle of a women's life. Shalvi reminds us that techinot, women's prayers, were for a long time a way for women to speak in the language of prayer about the necessities of their lives.

Jewish women, she concludes, now have the opportunity for innovation and creativity. As women become more Jewishly knowledgeable, they assert their space as half of the Jewish people.

What, we wonder, does this do for the men? Anxiety has been one prominent reaction to the continuing advancement of women within the secular world, as well as the world of Jewish thought and observance. It is up to all of us, she cautions, to make men realize that we are seeking a partnership in the family and in society, not a dominant role.

As Jews, male and female, we can recognize the value of insight from every source. Just as interpretation of literature and historical circumstance changes when a woman examines them, just as breast cancer research forges ahead when women physicians enter the field, so things change when feminine insights are used.

Shalvi is now affiliated with the Conservative movement; this means many things, among them, that she felt the pace of change within the Orthodox community did not reflect her own philosophy. That she remains an observant Jew and an outspoken women's advocate, no matter where she "lives," philosophically speaking, bodes well for the future of Jewish life.

"Yes, but..."

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Recently, the United Nations Human Rights Committee took Canada and the province of Ontario to task for the province's refusal to support private religious schools on the same basis as it funds Catholic schools. In 1976, Canada ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

The covenant provides that individuals are entitled to equal protection of law without discrimination on the basis of, among other grounds, religion.

The committee determined that Ontario and, consequently, Canada were in violation of this provision. The committee stated: "if a state party chooses to provide public funding to religious schools, it should make this funding available without discrimination."

The committee further held that any discrimination in funding must be based upon "reasonable and objective criteria." Apparently, even the fact that Canada's two state-funded education systems – one public and the other Catholic – are constitutionally mandated did not impress the Committee as being a "reasonable and objective" basis for the differential treatment accorded private religious schools.

The UN Committee on Human Rights gave Canada 90 days to comply with the decision or, at least, propose a remedy. There are really only two possible remedies: first, cut off funding to Catholic schools. This is virtually impossible as it would require a constitutional amendment. Or second, give funding to other private religious schools on the same basis as to the Catholic system.

Although this seems to be a possible solution as only two percent of the students in the province presently attend private religious schools, the spectre exists, based upon the UN ruling, that more private religious schools will be established – Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh, Islamic, Fundamentalist Christian of all persuasions, and Jewish – and that more parents, knowing that the education is free, will choose to send their children to these schools, leading to greater costs to the government and undercutting the viability of the public school system. It is not surprising that Ontario seems opposed to following the UN ruling.

Nor can the federal government require them to follow the UN decision.

Canada can enter into international agreements but they cannot – according to most authorities – bind the provinces to those agreements in areas of provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, the UN decision is effectively unenforceable. Nonetheless, the decision was heralded as a great victory for the Jewish community.

Yes, but … is this really good for the Jews? Undoubtedly, this is good for all those parents who feel overburdened by religious school fees but the Jewish community must recognize that there is a negative side to accepting public funding for religious schooling.

For example, once a school receives government funding, the government may well decide to set the criteria for admission into the school. They may dictate to the schools that they must accept all children who wish to go to the school regardless of religious affiliation. The niceties of halachic interpretations of "who is a Jew" may be lost on the minister of education.

Furthermore, the government may want to have input into, or even decide, curriculum issues or staffing priorities. (Perhaps, the rabbis can become members of the teachers' union.)

As my father-in-law would say: "When you take the government's money, the government becomes your partner." And sometimes, when you take on a partner, he thinks that he knows how to run your business better than you.

We clearly have a problem with the high cost of Jewish education. For many families, it is financially prohibitive. This application brought before the UN Human Rights Committee is really an attempt to force the provincial government of Ontario to help the Jewish community solve a Jewish problem.

It reminds one of the problem with agunot – women whose husbands will not give them a get – a Jewish divorce. We lobbied the federal government to amend the divorce legislation to effectively compel recalcitrant husbands to give their former wives religious divorces.

There, too, we sought the assistance of the government to solve what is essentially a religious problem.

Do we really want to invite governments to enter the Jewish arena to help us solve Jewish problems? We should have been able to devise solutions to these problems ourselves. Besides, after awhile, perhaps these governments will feel free to enter the Jewish domain without an invitation.

The Kirshner File

The greening of the northern Negev Desert

"There was not a tree here!" exclaimed Nisan Tsuri, his voice booming, his right hand scanning the horizon.

Tsuri, a robust 84, stood under a blazing sun as he succinctly described what the northern Negev Desert looked like when Kibbutz Nir Am, his home, was established more than 50 years ago.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Born in Eastern Europe, Tsuri settled in Palestine in 1936, when it was a British colony and the notion of an independent Jewish state still seemed distant.

Back in the 1930s, the Negev was far more desolate and isolated than it is today. While Jews struggled to develop the coastal plain and the Galilee, they virtually bypassed the Negev because of its scarcity of water.

In the late 1930s, when Tsuri was a young man and the future of Palestine hung in the balance, Jewish holdings in the Negev came under the wing of the Jewish National Fund, whose chief mandate is land reclamation. True to its mission, the JNF laid the foundation for a string of new settlements in the Negev.

Nir Am, 10 kilometres northeast of the Gaza Strip, was one of them. It was founded in January 1943 with about 100 members, all of whom were from Central and Eastern Europe.

Thanks to the assistance rendered by a Jewish hydrologist from Switzerland, the settlers found water at a depth of 130 metres, a development which enabled Tsuri and his fellow kibbutzniks to plant citrus orchards, field crops and banana groves in what was essentially a wilderness inhabited almost exclusively by Bedouin Arabs.

The water not only benefited Nir Am, whose population has grown fourfold since the 1940s. In 1947, a year before the outbreak of the first Arab-Israeli war, a pipeline was laid from Nir Am to supply water to Jewish outposts in the vicinity.

During the War of Independence, Nir Am, a base for the Palmach and a supply centre for kibbutzim and moshavim in the Negev, was bombed by Egyptian forces. Five kibbutzniks were killed by these bombardments, said Tsuri, pointing to a building still bearing cracks from the fighting.

Five decades after that war, Nir Am, though quite prosperous, ran into a serious problem, a lack of sufficient and affordable water for its agricultural sector.

The JNF stepped in, building a reservoir with the aid of the Bloomfield family and other JNF supporters in Montreal. The reservoir, with a capacity of 2.6 million cubic metres of recycled water from Tel Aviv, lowers the cost of water by approximately 18 percent, said Esther Weinstein, a JNF spokesperson who accompanied me to Nir Am and other localities in the Negev.

In line with Action Plan: Negev, a special program to further develop the Negev's agricultural potential, the JNF is building yet more reservoirs in this parched but promising region of Israel. According to Weinstein, 10 reservoirs already have been constructed in the northwestern Negev, where Nir Am is found.

Action Plan: Negev is also in the business of building hothouses. On Shahar, a dusty moshav west of the town of Kiryat Gat, hothouses erected five years ago are producing middle-stem roses for the European export market.

Hanoch Cohen, a gruff farmer who lives here, said that conditions in this part of the Negev are ideal for roses. "We grow three crops a year," he said.

Cohen buys rose buds from Holland, plants them in volcanic soil lifted from the Golan Heights rich in nutrients, and ships the fresh roses to Holland's flower exchange.

Panoramic view of the Yateer Forest, Israel's largest manmade woodland.

By his estimation, Shahar's hothouses, set on 100 acres, account for 10 percent of Israeli roses. Nearly two-thirds of all the roses in Israel are grown in the Negev. The Jordan Valley accounts for the rest of the crop.

As well, Action Plan: Negev builds recreational sites. An example is the Eshkol National Park, near Sderot.

The land on which it sits is historically important. During World War I, a British general, Edmund Allenby, launched an attack against a Turkish Ottoman stronghold in the Gaza Strip from what is now Sderot. Two previous assaults in 1916 and 1917 had failed.

The offensive, taking the form of a flanking movement, was successful. Allenby's victory was instrumental in driving the Ottomans out of Palestine and paving the way for Britain's League of Nations mandate.

The Ottoman presence in the Eshkol National Park, save for a grove of mature tamarisk trees, has been completely erased. Not even the remnants of their fortresses remain.

The JNF built the park in honour of an Israeli prime minister, in the mid-1980s. Laced with streams, studded with pools, and shaded by trees of all shapes and varieties, this fetching green space attracts visitors from near and afar. During my brief visit, young Israeli Arab campers gambolled on its grounds.

The Yateer Forest, in the Hebron hills 40 kilometres northeast of Beersheva, perfectly exemplifies Action Plan: Negev's afforestation program.

Consisting of 5,500 acres of Jerusalem pine, stone pine, brutia pine, cypress, almond, oak and carob trees, it is Israel's biggest manmade forest. Always being expanded, it lies 600 to 800 metres above sea level.

Originally planted in 1964 to demarcate the Green Line from the West Bank, it adjoins the Lahav forest, which is about 8,000 acres in size. Filled with park benches for picnickers, the Yateer Forest is, first and foremost, a recreational area for the enjoyment of people from Negev communities like Arad, Beersheva and Dimona. Surrounded by bleak, bone-dry desert, the forest is an enticing patch of greenery in a wasteland.

In ancient times, a Byzantine village, Hirbet Anim, stood here. The tumbled-down ruins of stone dwellings, mills and wells can still be seen today. Judging by a ruined synagogue, with its bimah facing north to Jerusalem, Israelites once lived in this place.

Canadians have played no small role in developing this rolling woodland.

The Jubilee Forest, a section of Yateer, was cultivated with the help of Canadian donors.

George Cohon, chair of Toronto-based McDonald's Canada, contributed funds for the George A. Cohon Family Youth Activities Centre, which was inaugurated in 1994.

Joel King, a Montrealer, donated funds for picnic tables and the upkeep of trails.

As we drove away from Yateer, my attention was drawn to a newly-planted forest of spindly saplings that, one day, will cover these bare hills in a sylvan embrace.

The saplings are from Gilat, one of three JNF nurseries in Israel. Close to Sderot, Gilat supplies the afforestation needs of the entire Negev from Kiryat Gat to Eilat.

Bristling with colourful shrubs like oleander and thousands of delicate saplings such as pines, palms and pistachios, Gilat has yielded upwards of one million saplings for JNF's afforestation campaign.

Over the years, the JNF has planted some 200 million trees in Israel. It has thus hugely contributed to the greening of Israel, an environmental feat of major proportions in a largely arid country.

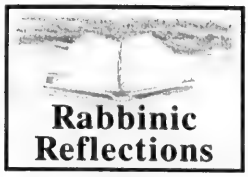
CAMP NEW YEARS



A number of menorahs

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

How many menorahs are supposed to be lit in the home on Chanukah?

One touches upon an interesting cultural phenomenon in answering this question.

I often ask people how many menorahs they lit in their home when they were growing up. Did they light one menorah for the whole family, or did all the members of the family light their own menorahs? Most people answer that they lit one menorah for the whole family. This is the answer from Ashkenazim and from Sepharadim.

The reason this is of interest to me is that it is not consistent with the Shulchan Aruch which says that the Sephardi practice is to light one menorah for the whole family while the Ashkenazim light one menorah for each family member. If there are five people in the family, then they all light their own menorah, for a total of five.

Yet, in spite of the fact that the Shulchan Aruch says that all Ashkenazi family members should light their own menorah, in practice, most Ashkenazim lit one menorah for the whole family.

In our times, we see a new phenomenon as young Jews become much more textually proficient. When they learn from the books that each member of the family should light, they change their family's practice.

What was done in the past needs to be changed to conform to what the authorities say. If we only lit one menorah, it was probably because we weren't that knowledgeable, but now that we know what we should be doing, let's change to have all the family members light their own menorah.

Rabbi Chaim Soloveitchik wrote of this phenomenon – the replacement of tradition with books, the replacement of learning how to live Jewishly through one's family traditions by book learning. Our teachers now are our books. In previous generations, our teachers for how to perform mitzvot were our families – our mothers and fathers, grandmothers and grandfathers.

We live in a new world. The passing on of tradition, of love of Judaism, of knowledge of Jewish life, does not happen in the home anymore. Of course, to some extent it does, but predominantly, we live in a world where independent thinking is common, where the greatest influences are outside of the home and not within.

For young Jews, what may have been sufficient in previous years is no longer adequate. The Jewish education of Hebrew school, which had some degree of success 50 years ago, is simply not adequate anymore.

The education in previous years, of seeing grandparents and parents, of learning from the practices of the home, is a thing of the past to a very large extent. Our homes are not strong enough, our neighbourhoods are not full of the signs and smells of Jewish living. We need to replace this learning atmosphere of previous years with a greater emphasis on formal education and on books.

The teachers of today are books – which is why you will see more homes where everyone lights their own menorah, in spite of the fact that in their parents' and grandparents' home they lit only one.

Chanukah time on the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, more reasons to travel the Jewish Highway this Chanukah.

Reason No. 5: The crafts & decorations

One of the unique qualities of Chanukah is the mitzvah of pirsuma d'nissa – the requirement to publicize and make known the miracle [http://www.wein-destiny.com/miketz-chan59.htm]. The traditional method of doing this is by lighting a menorah. But you can find great decorations and crafts on the Internet to publicize the holiday by printing out pictures, colouring books and even electronic art.

There are all sorts of free holiday clip art like dreidels at [http://www.kidsdomain.com/holiday/chanukah/icons.html] or Star of David Window Ornaments at [http://billybear4kids.com/holidays/hanukkah/craft/star.htm]. The Uncle Debi's site has images from various Jewish holidays including Chanukah [http://home.wnm.net/~debi/jart.htm] as does the Graphics Grabber [http://www.sierra.com/sierrahome/publishing/grabber/] and Freegraphics [http://www.freegraphics.com/images/downloads/chanu kah/].

Don't miss the online colouring book at [http://www.cass.net/~rainiew/sarahbear/bigc4/colorbig.htm] or the ones you can print out at Torahtots [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/chanuka/chanclr.htm] and Holidays on the Net [http://www.holidays.net/chanukah/pix.htm].

You can download Chanukah wallpaper for your computer or change your computer's icons and cursors [http://billybear4kids.com/desktop/hanukkah/wallpapr.htm]. But as the site wisely says, "Before you do this, or download anything, ask your parents if it is okay."

Reason No. 6: The food

You may want a bit of a break from the latkes [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/hanukkah/recipe.htm] and jam-filled doughnuts [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/sufgan1.htm]. There are many recipes out there – with and without oil. Richard Amster takes a look at the history of the traditional foods and then includes recipes for carrot pancakes, applesauce and chocolate covered honey almonds [http://www.jewishfamily.com/food-amster.htm]. More recipes to keep your belt tight are at [http://magellan.excite.com/lifestyle/food_and_drink/recipes/recipes_c/chanukah].

For something different, try Moroccan sfenji (orange doughnut rings), Dutch joodse boterkoeke or Chanukah Swedish tea cookies [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/chaindex.htm]. If you need help putting an entire holiday meal together, take a look at Epicurious [http://www.epicurious.com/e_eating/e04_hanukkah/hanmenus.html]. The Sephardic Hanukkah Dinner for Eight will have you dining on roasted eggplant and pepper and braised lamb in pomegranate sauce. Or you can go Italian.

Reason No. 7: The greeting cards

Chanukah draws to a close on Saturday night. And it's not too late to say hello. Just drop people a line, on line. There are several sites where you can e-mail colourful postcards with a personalized message [http://magellan.excite.com/lifestyle/holidays/jewish/hanukkah/virtual_cards].

You can even create an animated Chanukah card accompanied by music [http://www.marlo.com/heb/chanukah.htm] or a card with an attached recipe [http://www.freewebcard.com/cards/chanukah/].

Reason No. 8: The gelt

According to Ohr Somayach, giving gelt goes back to the Talmud. "A very poor person must light Chanukah lights, even if he can't afford it. A person with no money is required to go 'knocking on doors' until he collects enough to buy at least one candle for each night of Chanukah."

But in order to make things as dignified as possible for the recipient, the custom arose to voluntarily give gifts of money during Chanukah so that someone who needs extra money for Chanukah candles can receive it in the form of Chanukah gelt. [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask173.htm#Q5]

The Celebrate with JOI site suggests another link between gelt and Chanukah. It points out that the Maccabees were permitted to mint their own coins as an expression of their newly won independence [http://www.joi.org/celebrate/hanuk/gelt.htm].

Teaching history in Israel

By LILY KUTNER

Guest Voices

The media has recently reported on a disturbing new trend in the teaching of history in Israel's high schools. A new textbook written by Prof. Eyal Naveh of Tel Aviv University challenges the "official" version taught until now.

While the old historiography told us, for example, that in the War of Independence, the Israelis fought as "the few against the many," Naveh's book claims that the Israeli army was stronger and even larger than the Arab forces aligned against it.

What army? I was living in Israel at the time and know the facts first hand. My younger brother was in the Palmach (the volunteer underground strike force) and the Haganah.

On Nov. 29, 1947, the General Assembly of the United Nations approved the recommendation to partition Palestine into two independent states, Jewish and Arab. The Arab states rejected the resolution and decided to solve "the problem" by force. There were immediate outbreaks of Arab violence in all parts of Palestine; killing, burning and looting were daily occurrences.

Now, over 50 years later, Palestinian Arabs are negotiating with Israel to get what they rejected in 1947. What has indeed changed during this time is the degree to which their propaganda has succeeded in finding acceptance.

The last British soldier and the last British high commissioner left Haifa on the morning of May 14, 1948. On the same day Israel was proclaimed.

There was no limit to the jubilation – people singing and dancing in the streets. Unfortunately, it didn't last long. The same night, Tel Aviv was bombarded. Five Arab nations with millions of well-armed soldiers attacked the Jewish state of 600,000 – where the fighting force consisted of 51,000 men, some as young as 16.

The Arab attempt to crush Israel at birth began the War of Independence, a fact ignored by the new historians. Lack of arms was a major problem for the Yishuv. Naval and artillery forces were created from scratch. My older brother Daniel enlisted in the navy as an officer.

On May 26, the Israel defence army, Tzahal, was established. My husband was immediately recruited to the engineering units, so again I had first hand information on the conditions of the war.

According to the Arab version of events, the refugee problem was created in 1948, when the colonialist Jews expelled the Palestinians from their villages and cities.

At the time of the Arab "exodus," I lived in the suburbs of Haifa, Kiryat Hashmal. I heard our leaders over the loudspeaker announcing in Hebrew and in Arabic: "Our Arab neighbours, please don't flee, nothing bad will happen to you." The same announcements were made all over the country.

During the first few years of Israel's existence, over one million Jews were expelled from Arab lands, leaving all their property and possessions behind. Israel welcomed and absorbed them, as well as the Holocaust survivors who arrived broken, physically and emotionally. They were all incorporated into the Yishuv and became productive elements of society. But the Arab states kept the Palestinians in camps, as hostages, in order to keep the hostility festering.

Now, Israel's historians, like Benny Morris and Tom Segev, have taken the Arab refugees myth, and worked it into the collective Israeli consciousness.

The astonishing fact is not that the new history has been published and adopted as an official textbook, but that the people of Israel seem not to care.

It is heartbreaking that Israeli youth is now being robbed of the knowledge that the State of Israel was not granted to us "on a silver platter." It was indeed won by the "few against the many" thanks to the patriotism, wisdom, determination, and sacrifice of its defenders, whom, I suspect, cry out of their graves against the new history. Among those defenders are brother Daniel, husband Baruch, and nephew Giora. Yehi zichram baruch!

Centring on the Holocaust

The Holocaust in American Life*, by Peter Novick (Houghton Mifflin Company, $39.95).

Books
Bernard Baskin

I was 25 when World War II ended. During my university years, I seldom heard mention of the Holocaust.

In those days, few wanted to talk about the Holocaust, or hear or read about it. People were too close to it in time. It was too horrible to comprehend.

Everything changed in 1967 with the Six Day War. Gamal Abdel Nasser's threat to drive the Jews of Israel into the sea caused long suppressed feelings about the Holocaust to surface.

Books on the Holocaust, by Jewish and non-Jewish authors, now fill our shelves. First-person accounts by survivors proliferate unendingly. The Holocaust is now the most popular course in many universities and has also made its way to the movie and television screen. The American federal government now sponsors a popular Holocaust Memorial Museum. In many American cities, Holocaust centres have been built or will be built.

A well-known American Rabbi argues that our values are skewed. We build monuments to the victims of the Holocaust, yet we neglect to honour the great sages of the Talmud or the other spiritual giants of the Jewish past. We are promoting Jewish continuity on the basis of a negative. We are making the murder of European Jewry the main reason for remaining Jewish.

Centring our thoughts on the Holocaust can also convey a morbid impression of Judaism to the young and impressionable for whom being Jewish may come to mean suffering abuse, discrimination, and bigotry. Unaware of the many positive features of Judaism they may eventually believe that Jewish history is filled with nothing but misfortune and tragedy.

These and similar concerns are among those raised and argued in this thought provoking and often disturbing work by a professor of history at the University of Chicago.

The author maintains that the Holocaust is virtually the only common denominator of American Jewish identity in the late 20th century that can "confront increasing communal anxiety about Jewish continuity in the face of declining religiosity, together with increasing assimilation and a sharp rise in intermarriage, all of which threaten demographic catastrophe." He maintains, with other Jewish thinkers, that a Holocaust-centred Judaism will not work to ensure Jewish survival.

The author acknowledges that "at bar and bat mitzvahs, in a growing number of communities, the child is 'twinned' with a young victim of the Holocaust who never lived to have the ceremony, and by all reports the kids like it a lot. Adolescent Jews who go on organized tours to Auschwitz and Treblinka have reported that they were 'never so proud to be a Jew' as when, at these sites, they vicariously experienced the Holocaust. Jewish college students oversubscribe to courses on the Holocaust, and rush to pin yellow stars to their lapels on Yom Hashoah."

In an unusual evaluation, Novick writes, "One of the things I find most striking about much recent Jewish Holocaust commemoration is how 'un-Jewish' – how Christian – it is. I am thinking of the ritual of reverently following the structured pathways of the Holocaust in the major museums, which resembles nothing so much as the Stations of the Cross on the Via Dolorosa. Also the symbolic representations of the Holocaust – notably in the climax of Elie Wiesel's Night – that employ crucifixion imagery. Perhaps most significantly, there is the way that suffering is sacralized and portrayed as the path to wisdom – the cult of the survivor as secular saint. These are themes that have some minor and peripheral precedent in Jewish tradition, but they resonate more powerfully with major themes in Christianity."

It is regrettable that the memory of the Shoah has had a negligible influence on Washington's response to genocide in places like Biafra and Cambodia. Concerning America's hesitant response to Serb atrocities in Bosnia, for example Novick asserts that "'the lessons of Vietnam' … easily trumped 'the lessons of Holocaust.'"

Prodigiously researched, fair in presenting alternate points of view, richly layered – this is a timely and necessary book.

"This is the gate of the Lord, come through it, you who have fed the hungry, cared for the ill, clothed the naked, and warmed the cold …" (Midrash Psalms 118:17)

Spirit of Palmerston Shul still living in Shaarei Zion

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The Palmerston Shul, founded more than 75 years ago, was one of dozens of small synagogues established in the old downtown Jewish community.

As was the case in many small congregations, attendance at the Palmerston Shul – formally named the Agudath Israel Anshei Sfard – dwindled as members of the Jewish community migrated north along the Bathurst Street corridor.

But while many of the downtown shuls have disappeared and been forgotten, the Palmerston Shul, though no longer a physical entity, lives on in spirit through Shaarei Zion, which was founded in the late '60s.

The Shaarei Zion is a small Orthodox congregation that holds Shabbat and holiday services at Associated Hebrew School's Danilack Campus at 6100 Leslie St.

Dr. George Adam, spokesperson for Shaarei Zion, explained the connections between his congregation and the Palmerston Shul.

When the building of the original Palmerston Shul was sold in 1979, the members decided to give the sifrei Torah and their excess cemetery plots to Associated Hebrew Schools. Shaarei Zion now uses those scrolls and its congregants feel a strong affinity with the old shul, Adam said.

At the same time, the members of the Palmerston Shul donated three marble wall plaques from the original Palmerston Shul. The plaques now hang on the walls of the Danilack campus in front of the school's synagogue, he said.

Adam, a member for 10 years, described the Shaarei Zion as a comfortable and intimate congregation. "It's really nice and it's small. I felt at home here and I became a regular."

He said the congregation numbers about a dozen families, with a regular Shabbat attendance of 20 to 30 men and women of all ages. On holidays, there are considerably more people.

He said the oldest member is about 85, and there are also teens and pre-teens. "They like the small heimish atmosphere. Most of the teenagers go to CHAT.

"We don't have services during the week because the synagogue is used by the school," he said.

Adam said Shabbat services include "a very nice kiddush" and a d'var Torah prepared by Prof. Marvin Gold, the lay spiritual leader. Gold is a microbiologist at The University of Toronto.

Adam said the Shaarei Zion is "very traditional." It has a mechitzah and it tends to serve observant people who live in the area and don't want to drive, and Orthodox people visiting the area, he said.

"We serve observant people from out of town who are coming to see their families. One of the out-of-towners is a rabbi who comes back regularly from Cleveland, and there's a rabbi who lives in Beersheva and another from Jerusalem."

The synagogue is listed in the community directory and The Jewish Traveller's Guide, he added.

Adam said the shul would appeal to people interested in a more traditional service, but who want to daven in a smaller group setting.

The congregation was considerably larger in the '70s, according to longtime member Martin Scherer. He noted that a group of men who lived in the Leslie and Don Mills area began praying together in each other's homes in the late '60s.

When the group grew, they purchased property in the vicinity of Steeles Avenue and Leslie Street, and davened in a portable on the property. In the '70s, the congregation had as many as 50 member families, said Scherer, who joined the congregation in 1983.

But more than 50 percent of those families moved north to Thornhill in the mid-'80s, he said, noting Ab Bergson is the only congregant left who was part of the original group.

Instead of people moving northeast, they went north on Bathurst, Scherer said.

In 1983, with the completion of the first phase of Associated's Danilack campus, Shaarei Zion sold its property and began holding services at the school, he said.

Adam said some of the money from the sale of the property was used to hire rabbis.

"That money ran out in early '90s...There was no rabbi after that. One of the members took it upon himself to lead the service. He [Gold] works like a dog to teach and prepare."

Adam said his son Paul, 14, had his bar mitzvah at Shaarei Zion. "He leined the whole parshah. He gave a d'var Torah and we had a sit down cold buffet for 120 people."

But bar mitzvahs there only take place about once every other year, Adam said."Basically this is a small congregation with a group of regulars who come week after week."

Scherer called the congregation "the northeast shtiebl."

Adam said that while most of the members are observant, everyone is welcome.

"We're very happy to have anyone come. We try and make them feel comfortable. We're tolerant. We take people as they are. If people become more observant along the way, that's a bonus."

He said belonging to Shaarei Zion is like living in a small town within a big city. "We know all the people. They all know each other and they help each other out.

"It's one of the advantages of being a small congregation... You really feel you matter. You really do count."

Campaign Climbs to $33.5 Million

UJA Federation campaigners are working overtime to reach as many contributors as possible for the final stretch of Campaign 2000, which officially ends December 15.

Hundreds of dedicated volunteers, including a team of top campaigners, have been putting in extra hours during recent weeks, some making calls in the evening from their offices, in order to contact 5,000 community members who have not yet made gifts to UJA Federation's Campaign 2000. Another set of Answer the Call telethons took place this week pushing the total funds raised so far passed the $33.5 million mark.

Additional telethons will be held throughout December to give representatives from dozens of community agencies and organizations the opportunity to participate in the last UJA Federation telephone blitz of the millennium.

"The enthusiasm shown by the community has been overwhelming," notes Igor Korenzvit, who is chairing the Community Campaign Countdown with Shirley Worth.

Shirley Worth and Igor Korenzvit recently welcomed 60 of UJA Federation's leading campaigners and their families to a special pre-Raptors game reception to express appreciation for their hard work.

"The home stretch is always the hardest, but our campaigners won't stop until every last contributor is contacted," adds Worth. "If we don't do our best to reach as many people as possible our agencies won't be able to provide much needed services to the most vulnerable among us."

Members of the Bernard Betel Centre held a month-long drive in November to raise funds and awareness about Campaign 2000. Bernice Goldhar and three other Betel volunteers took turns staffing the display table for three hours every day. "It feels good to help out any way we can," notes Goldhar.

Even younger community members are pitching in to help raise funds for Jews in need. After hearing Ethiopian immigrant Mehereta Baruch speak about how the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency saved her life, Leo Baeck Day School students have decided to embark on a new fundraising drive with proceeds going to UJA Federation.

If you would like to make a gift to UJA Federation Campaign 2000, please call (416) 631-5705, mail a cheque to UJA Federation, 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto, M2R 3V2, or visit the Jewish Toronto Web Site (www.jewishtoronto.net) for Internet payments.

UJA on Campus

Mo Glazman may look like any another young co-ed making his way through a sea of students at Toronto's two largest universities, but he's not rushing to get to class.

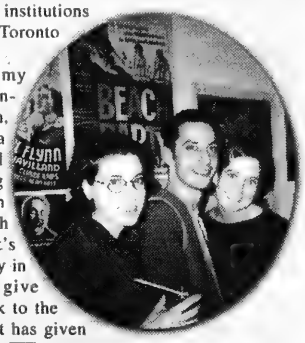
Mo Glazman

Instead, the 24 year old McGill graduate is in a hurry to meet as many Jewish students as possible and get them involved with UJA Federation.

"It's my job to find ways of making lasting connections between students and their community through meaningful involvement with UJA Federation," explains Glazman, the organization's new campus coordinator. Before joining UJA, Glazman, who has spent the last two summers coordinating programs for youth through Canadian Jewish Congress.

"I spend a lot of time shmoozing," admits Glazman, who mingles with students in between classes to find out what kinds of activities they're interested in. Working closely with Jewish Campus Services, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, Glazman is already planning a number of events for the new year that he hopes will have broad appeal to the over 15,000 Jewish students attending post secondary institutions in the Greater Toronto Area.

"This is my ideal job," confesses Glazman, who is also a professional vocalist, singing regularly at Beth Emeth Synagogue. "It's like I get to stay in school and give something back to the community that has given so much to me."



(above) Last year over 150 jewish students gathered at Oasis for a UJA on Campus sponsored event which raised funds for the annual campaign.

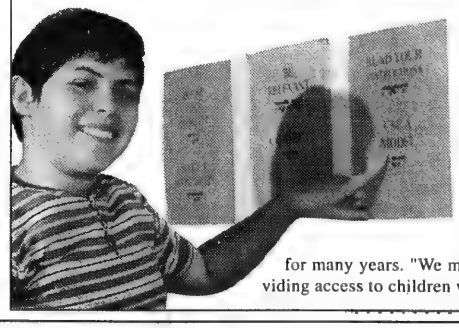
Surveying Special Needs

UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is stepping up its efforts to enhance services for students with special needs.

The BJE's Special Education Committee is in the process of gathering information from community members about how to better assist students in both Jewish day and supplementary schools. During the next two months the Committee will be soliciting input via The Canadian Jewish News, the Jewish Toronto website (www.jewishtoronto.net), schools, synagogues and community centre offices.

"We want to hear from all the stakeholders including parents and students," explains Rhona Shulman, Chair of the BJE's Special Education Committee.

According to the BJE, anywhere between 10% and 20% of Jewish students in the Greater Toronto Area struggle with some type of learning disability. The BJE provides remedial and psycho-educational help through Jewish Vocational Services to children with special needs, but many parents and educators feel that some students are falling through the cracks.



"If we are going to keep students with special needs in the system, we are going to have to find ways of expanding both the quantity and range of services available," says Shulman.

"We have a wonderful policy in our community that no child should be denied a Jewish education because of financial circumstances," notes Gerry Richler, a Special Education Committee member who has been an advocate for students with special needs for many years. "We must adhere to a similar policy when it comes to providing access to children with exceptionalities."

Messianic Times complaints

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress and Jews for Judaism say they received dozens of complaints from residents in Thornhill and in highrise buildings in the Bathurst-Steeles area who received a copy of the Messianic Times last week.

The 32-page, full colour newspaper appears to be a Jewish publication, but is filled with articles and ads praising Jesus as the "Jewish messiah."

The paper reappeared after an absence of several months.

This edition promotes the City of David messianic congregation at Bathurst and Steeles.

It is produced by Zev Isaacs, a Hebrew-Christian who once lived in Toronto.

The complaints have come mainly from the elderly and Russian-speakers, said CJC Ontario region's Bernie Farber.

"If Mr. Isaacs and his crew think this will affect our community, he's dead wrong," Farber said tersely. "In fact, if anything, it moves our community to anger and frustration. It does him no good at all."

Historic home demolished

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After learning that his grandfather's house had been demolished to make way for a University of Toronto information technology building, Marvin Fremes burst into tears.

Located at 42 St. George St., the house built by Mendel Granatstein for $13,000 in 1919 was the first house in the city to be owned by a Jew, according to the records of Heritage Toronto.

Fremes, who lived in the house as a young child, said he remembers an indoor sukkah with a metal lattice-work grille ceiling. The roof could be rolled back, allowing the sky to be viewed from within the room.

"It was a grand house for its time. There are poignant memories associated with it," says Fremes.

Lois Greisman, Granatstein's great great granddaughter, says her family often drove by the house, and she is sorry that she never had a chance to go through it.

"Mendel came to Canada from Poland in 1891. He became a peddler, and eventually saved enough money to start his own business, M. Granatstein & Sons.

"He purchased old clothing, rags and other fabrics, processed them, and broke them down into fibre, which was then spun into yarn. Eventually, trade expanded throughout North America and Europe.

"He insisted on signing his cheques in Yiddish. He was one of the only men in Canada to be permitted to do so. This might have been his trademark. He was proud to have accomplished so much in a new country without knowing the language.

"He was the unofficial leader of the Polish-Jewish community in Toronto…He became one of the founders of the Beth Jacob Synagogue which opened on Henry Street in 1922."

Some years after his death in 1945, she said, the house was sold to the University of Toronto.

Sheldon Godfrey, a former chair of the Heritage Canada Foundation, and the author of several books on Canadian Jewish history, wrote Heritage Toronto when he discovered that the house was about to be demolished. Godfrey wanted to see about having the house designated as a heritage site under the Ontario Heritage Act.

"When I heard it had been demolished, I was shocked. [U of T] did have a right to tear it down, but I had hoped we would be able to learn something about the house before it was demolished.

"At this point, we can only trust that the university will properly commemorate the house in a way that is visible from the street," said Godfrey.

Jewish MPP Young defends government's policies

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

David Young

TORONTO — Rookie Ontario legislator David Young realizes there's a lot to know about being an MPP, especially one within the government.

"It's been a pretty steep learning curve," the 42-year-old Tory member for Willowdale told The CJN recently at his Queen's Park office. "But I'm getting used to the heckling and abuse in the legislature." Combine that with his having spent 18 years as a litigation lawyer and six years as a trustee of the North York Public School Board, and the transition, he says, has been "a little less steep."

Young was part of the Big Blue Machine's second straight majority victory in June's provincial vote. His win was not a big surprise; the riding had been held by then attorney general Charles Harnick, who'd been a popular representative. Young's victory, though, was not overwhelming. He outpolled his nearest rival 22,000 to 18,500 votes.

He became one of three Jewish MPPs (and the only one in government), joining Liberals David Caplan and Monte Kwinter.

Only three weeks after his win, Premier Mike Harris appointed him parliamentary assistant to the education minister.

What's a nice Jewish boy doing in this line of work?

Young chuckles. "I come from a rich tradition of nice Jewish boys: [Former Ontario Tory leader] Larry Grossman, Charles Harnick, Allan Grossman. So I'm in good company."

These days find the newcomer feeling a bit like an outreach worker. "I made a pledge during the election that I would continue to knock on doors," he says. And what's on his constituents' minds?

"There has been no one area, but I am hearing a lot about taxes, red tape and health care."

Young defends the government's record in all three areas.

"We are spending more on health care now despite federal transfer payments. We've undertaken to increase health care funding by 20 percent." Harris, he adds, has cut personal income taxes, with a further 20 percent reduction to come; will cut 20 percent from the provincial portion of residential property taxes; and has substantially reduced the size of government by appointing a permanent red tape watchdog.

As for extending public funds to private and independent schools, including Jewish day schools, Young is less committal. (The CJN's interview was conducted prior to the historic United Nations ruling that Canada, through Ontario, discriminates by funding Catholic schools and not other religious-based schools).

"I'm not in a position to make promises," he said. "But discussions are taking place. It's certainly helpful to receive briefs from Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith...[but] our priority is improving the public education system.

"I'm here to ensure that dialogue surrounding independent schools continues."

And even though Branson Hospital isn't in his riding, Young says the situation there isn't as bad as people might think.

Branson, he notes, has an urgent care clinic (even though it's not round-the-clock); it may be getting two Magnetic Resonance Imaging (MRI) units and an ophthalmology unit; and already has 100 long-term care beds.

The government's workfare program, which has met with much criticism, especially from religious groups, "is working. We have placed thousands of individuals in upgrading programs, and 400,000 people have left the welfare rolls. That's very important for people to understand."

Hate crimes are also on Young's agenda. He says he's had discussions with Attorney General Jim Flaherty on the subject, as well as on how best to curb hate on the Internet. He says one idea being explored is penalties against Internet service providers or search engines.

As for his boss, Young points out that Mike Harris has a high profile in the Jewish community. Young, who serves as a director of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, says the premier has shown sensitivity to Holocaust survivors, has spoken out against acts of vandalism and anti-Semitism, and generally, has many hidden qualities.

"You don't know Mike Harris," Young responds, when asked whether the premier suffers from an image of cold-heartedness. "He has a great love for this province. He's an intelligent individual."

Young's been married to Ellen Turk for 19 years; the couple has three children, Sarah, 14; Cory, 12; and Alycia, eight. All are in public schools.

His parents, Jack and Estelle, were founding members of Beth David Synagogue. Young's Warsaw-born father was a musician at a time when many clubs in Toronto did not admit Jews. That's why the family name was changed from Yashinsky.

With many issues before the government, Young's plate is full. Or as he put it in a recent statement, "We are not the government. We are the people elected to fix government, and the job is just beginning."

Rabbi explores natures of men, women in marriage

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Recognizing the inherent natures of men and women is what sustains a marriage, according to Rabbi Michel Twerski.

Rabbi Twerski is the spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Yehuda and director of Avir Yaakov Torah Learning Centre, both in Milwaukee. He and his wife, Faigie, a noted lecturer and counsellor, spoke last week at the Village Shul, to inaugurate the Jewish Family Institute.

Admitting that his theories might offend some people, he said that "the mainstream, whatever it is...that which is marked progressive, is not working."

Instead of a relationship of "peace, love, joy, caring, fulfillment, a place of feeling perfection and of feeling complete," he said, we see broken marriages, and all the problems associated with children from broken homes.

When Adam was created, Rabbi Twerski said, "the only person he might have had a relationship with was God;" realizing that, as it says in Genesis, it was not good for man to be alone, God created a companion, Chavah (Eve).

"Chavah came into a world where there was already another person," this difference in their beginnings is the basis of the difference between men and women, the rabbi said.

Women intuitively excel in relating to other people, he explained. Men, on the other hand, are "nerds" in this aspect of life, and are "moved by the need for spiritual quest."

Even the language of the genders is different. Women, he said, use language that synthesizes and connects. Men negotiate – their language conveys a jockeying for position."They may both be saying the same words, but they are not saying the same thing."

Adam was created in the image of God, full of energy, and the need to be creative. Until Chavah came along, he had no one to be creative for, no one to allow him to use his Godlike qualities. He felt something was missing.

When God brought Chavah to him, Adam felt "functionally complete," restored.

Chavah found in Adam "the place where she belonged, the source of her energy, the energy that would make her beautiful. She takes what Adam gives her, and transforms it into life," Rabbi Twerski said.

"Man without woman has no purpose, Woman without man has no life," he said.

The story of the apple continues to amplify the relationship between them, he said. Adam blamed Chavah for the sin. "He was an ingrate – he was punished for it."

Chavah felt "humiliated at the hands of the source of her being. She is not only condemned by God, but by man."

She needs someone to reach out and assure her safety, to look at her respectfully. "A man must make a woman feel desired and respected."

Man needs to feel that his partner needs him, appreciates his giving, and respects his capacity to make a better world, said Rabbi Twerski.

The bride circling the groom seven times under the chuppah, he said,is making the statement that her husband will be the most important person in her universe, "more than her parents, children, friends, or career."

He discussed the way Maimonides sums up the marital relationship: A husband must honour his wife more than himself, love her as much as himself, speak gently to her, and avoid creating tension in the home; a woman must honour her husband more than what is necessary, and do everything she can to meet his expectations. "He should be like a royal personnage in her eyes."

Interestingly, Rabbi Twerski added, "Rambam doesn't say that a woman must love her husband – just honour him."

A Jewish marriage is exalting, the rabbi said, because "each feels that he or she is given a throne by the spouse which they are never to abdicate."

Faigie Twerski gave more practical advice. She stressed the importance of fostering your own self esteem, saying that without loving yourself, you cannot love anyone else.

Each spouse must be a strong individual, in order for there to be a good relationship, she said. "If one of them is not strong, "there is emotional fusion, rather than emotional connection, where, like the instruments in an orchestra, each maintains his or her own identity."

Nevertheless, she added, the highest form of self-actualization is now considered to be the ability to transcend one's own needs to fulfill another's. That is what is implicit in the marriage relationship, she said.

Do small things to please the spouse, she advised. "Don't wait for the spouse to do it first."

Be able to truly forgive, she said, noting "there is no point in burying the hatchet if you put a marker on the spot."

Value how the other spouse spends his or her time, she said. She recommended that spouses find time to talk and that they should not go to sleep angry; each spouse should let other know when they do something that pleases them, or that they find admirable.

The Jewish Family Institute, dedicated by Harry and Yetta Nashman, is intended to "to stress the importance of communicating Torah ideals about improving relations between husband and wife, parent and child, friend and friend, explained Rabbi Yaakov Palatnik, spiritual leader of The Village Shul.

He noted that today it is "harder being a parent, harder being a kid, harder keeping a marriage together."

Bedouin problems explored

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Israeli doctor has painted a grim picture of Israel's Bedouin population in the Negev Desert.

The Bedouins suffer from a high incidence of genetic diseases and a low level of education, said Rivka Carmi, a professor of pediatric genetics at Ben-Gurion University and a senior neonatologist at the Soroka Medical Centre in Beersheva.

And many subsist on welfare, she added in a New Israel Fund lecture.

Carmi, whose research focuses on the 100,000-strong Bedouin community in southern Israel, said the Bedouin exhibit uncommonly high rates of congenital deafness, blindness and metabolic ailments due to inbreeding.

There are very few Bedouin professionals – doctors, lawyers or teachers – and about 50 percent of Bedouin women are illiterate, she pointed out.

Six percent of Bedouin students write high school matriculation exams, but only three percent pass them.

Carmi said that the quality of Bedouin schools is very low, lacking proper amenities and even air conditioning during the summer.

She called for the creation of an affirmative action program for Bedouin.

Rarely leaving their homes, Bedouin women are particularly neglected when it comes to education, Carmi suggested.

Only 65 Bedouin females attend Israeli universities, compared to 10 a decade ago.

And many Bedouin women who do reach university cannot cope with the cultural shock; they drop out, she disclosed.

According to Carmi, Bedouin wish to strike a balance between tradition and modernity.

Referring to efforts to help the Bedouin uplift themselves, Carmi described a remedial educational program at the Soroka Medical Centre designed to funnel Bedouin into the medical profession.

Bedouin communities lack basic resources, and the Israeli government is to blame for this situation, she said.

In her judgment, the previous government merely paid lip service to their problems.

Carmi said that Israeli Bedouin are no longer nomadic, having been forced to settle in towns or encampments, some of which have no clean running water and sewage facilities.

Bedouin, she reported, are regarded with disdain by their fellow Arabs in Israel.

In terms of their allegiance to Israel, some Bedouin are more loyal than others, she said.

Students take part in Unity Mission at GA

By NIKKI GREENSPAN
Special to The CJN

Among the thousands of delegates at the 1999 General Assembly of United Jewish Communities, held recently in Atlanta, 14 university students from Ontario came with their own agenda.

They were there not only to participate in the plenary sessions of the General Assembly and the Hillel Leadership programs, but also to participate in the 1999 Unity Mission, sponsored by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

The Unity Mission, which is now in its third year, brings together Ontario university students from the many branches of Judaism (Conservative, Reform, Orthodox and Reconstructionist).

We were there to learn about each other, with the help of guest speakers and group discussions, as well as to break down barriers that we may have erected, so that we can begin to work together as klal Yisrael – one people.

Prior to the trip, I was very naive about the other movements and their practices. Growing up, I was only familiar with the Conservative movement because I was involved with that branch of Judaism.

When I first heard about this trip, I thought it would be an excellent opportunity for me to learn more about myself, my movement and Judaism as a whole.

We had five sessions during the mission, with each focusing on a different branch of Judaism. The sessions were led by Rabbi David Wolfman (Reform), Dr. Yossi Kanofsky (Orthodox), Rabbi Matthew Burkewitz (Conservative) and Barry Chazan of the Bronfman Research Institute in Israel.

Each of the speakers explained the basic principles of his movement and answered questions. During the sessions we were able to break down stereotypes that we had of each movement, and we could begin building bridges instead of walls.

With each speaker came a new set of questions. For most of us, myself included, this was the first time that we could work in an open dialogue and ask even the most sensitive questions in a positive learning atmosphere.

While listening, I started to really think about my own Judaism – what defined me as a Jew.

As Rabbi Burkewitz of the Jewish Theological Seminary showed us, we must first wrestle internally with the different ways of expressing our Judaism before we can truly understand Judaism as a whole.

As I wrestled internally with my own ideas, I was fortunate to be in this setting.

Many different types of people, were at the General Assembly, and I found they were all willing to talk – not only about their jobs, or the plenary they just came from, but about how they defined their own Judaism.

As I spoke to each delegate and mentioned that I was there to take part in the Unity Mission, their focus shifted from the General Assembly to the mission of the Ontario young adults.

None of them had ever heard of this program and were shocked to learn that the many branches of Judaism could sit in a room together to learn, discuss and work.

I explained that even though many of us don't see eye to eye on every subject, we were trying to unite in one form or another. One man said to me: "We have a lot to learn from you students," and I believe he is right.

Now that we are all back in Ontario, we plan to share many Shabbats together.

We also plan to work on many more unity programs, which are not just for us, but for everyone on our university campuses.

I recognize that this trip helped me identify with the practices and traditions of my particular movement, as well as with the Jewish people as a whole.

As we wrestled internally with each topic, sometimes we could not come to an agreement. What we did learn, however, was that we are all Jews and exist for the same purpose: to build a stronger Israel and Jewish people.

Now that we have come to this understanding, it is time for all those around us. As this trip showed me, we can do anything, as long as we come with an open mind, open heart and desire to learn.

Senate bill seeks to bar refugee ships from Canada

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A bill proposed by a Canadian senator has come under fire for being chillingly reminiscent of Canada's none-is-too-many wartime policy on Jewish immigration.

And the senator whose name is on the would-be law is Jewish.

The name of Senator Ron Ghitter, a Conservative from Alberta appointed to the upper chamber in 1993, appears on a private member's bill that aims to deny ships bearing would-be refugee claimants entry into Canada

The proposed legislation, known as Bill S-8, is seen as a response to the four rusting boats that arrived in Canadian waters over the summer, bearing some 600 Chinese migrants. Many politicians, especially in the Reform party, called for the ships to be turned back.

The bill, which received first reading in the Senate Nov. 2, seeks to restore the immigration minister's authority to prevent entry of vessels into Canadian territorial waters, or to escort vessels already in Canadian waters to the nearest port.

Exceptions would be made if passengers' lives are endangered, or if passengers seeking refugee status have been removed from the ship and brought into Canada.

Canadian Jewish Congress says the bill is harsh and possibly, illegal under the Charter of Rights.

In its concern over the bill, Congress has raised the spectre of the St. Louis, the ill-fated ship of refugees who fled Nazi Germany in 1939; 937 mostly Jewish asylum-seekers were turned away by several western governments, including Canada.

Senator Ron Ghitter

The ship was forced to return to Europe, where an estimated half of its passengers ended up perishing at the hands of the Nazis.

"In a year in which we observed the 60th anniversary of the fate of the St. Louis, we must be aware of the potential for tragic consequences in turning ships away," Congress said in a statement.

"Rather than turn away boats, we must have systems and sufficient resources in place to adjudicate refugee claims in a timely fashion," remarked Sheva Medjuck, chair of CJC's social action committee.

Congress has also noted that Ghitter's apparent backing of the bill is ironic, given that he has a long history of involvement with human rights organizations.

He's a past recipient of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews' Human Relations Award.

Stephen Ball, a spokesperson for Ghitter, told The CJN that Ghitter's sponsorship of the bill was "a procedural mix-up."

Ball said that another senator, Gerry St. Germain, intended to bring the bill forward, but that Ghitter's name appears on it.

He said Ghitter does not intend to speak to the bill.

It was because of you that we were able to make this time of sadness into a time of happy reflection. Children's foundation opens Montreal branch

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Efforts are underway, through an organization with its only Canadian branch here, to make Montreal a major centre for dealing with childhood communication and learning disorders.

The non-profit Unicorn Children's Foundation (UCF) was founded five years ago in Boca Raton, Fla., by former Montrealer Dr. Mark Rosenbloom, as a way to develop a more comprehensive approach to what he says is a growing epidemic.

Rosenbloom, who visited Montreal recently, knows from personal experience. His eight-year-old son Sammy, whose intelligence has been rated significantly above average, has yet to utter his first words, although he writes eloquently.

Rosenbloom says his son's condition, known as dyspraxia, was not properly assessed until several years after it should have been, in part, he feels, because there is no holistic, unified approach to children's learning and communication disorders among professionals in the field.

Communication problems in children range from dyslexia, attention deficit disorder and hyperactivity, to conditions such as pervasive developmental disorder and autism.

Rosenbloom says the number of cases, for no conclusively known reasons thus far, have mushroomed to one in 10 children at a cost to the medical system of $500 billion (US) per year in North America.

To address this problem, Rosenbloom founded UCF. In addition to the one in Boca Raton, the organization has offices in Chicago, Washington, D.C., and now, Montreal. One of its major supporters has been Hollywood star Sylvester Stalone, whose son is autistic.

"Everyone in this field had their own body of knowledge but nobody talked to each other," said Rosenbloom, an attending emergency room physician at Chicago's Northwestern Memorial Hospital and an assistant professor of clinical medicine at Northwestern University's medical school.

"Things never got together in a multi-disciplinary way."

With the Unicorn organization, Rosenbloom hopes the situation is changing.

Since its founding, Unicorn has sponsored conferences, issued numerous publications, established a lending library, and made an all-out effort to increase professional and public awareness about a trend that previously got little attention, despite its pervasiveness.

One of the projects Rosenbloom says he is most proud of is the foundation's Internet resource directory of professionals at www.saveachild.com, which lists over 2,200 practitioners in fields dealing with communication and learning disorders.

The list includes specialists in pediatric and developmental neurology, child and adolescent psychology, clinical and developmental psychology, occupational therapy and speech and language pathology.

This kind of collaboration is key to any success the UCF will have, Rosenbloom says.

The UCF has, therefore, also formed an Interdisciplinary Council on Developmental and Learning Disorders (ICDL), which includes some of the world's leading professionals in the field.

The UCF and the ICDL are developing and preparing to publish a comprehensive set of guidelines for practitioners that will enable the assessment and treatment of children to be comprehensive, collaborative and truly child centred, he says.

According to Unicorn material, the guidelines, which will be distributed to 300,000 professionals, will enable hundreds of thousands of children with learning and communication disorders to be identified much earlier than they otherwise would be.

"Research has shown that the earlier one intervenes in these symptoms, the better the chances of altering the life impact on the child," the UCF material says. The preferred age for such identification is prior to the child's second birthday.

The Unicorn Foundation plans, by the end of next year, to establish 10 regional "centres for excellence," including some in Canada and in Israel, which will serve as centres for research and professional training, and will treat children.

Bone marrow donor sought

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish community here recently joined the international search for a bone marrow donor for Jeffrey Bornstein.

Bornstein, a 29-year-old doctor and father of two young children in North Carolina, was recently diagnosed with leukemia. His only hope for long-term survival is a bone marrow transplant.

Bone marrow donor registries in his native Montreal, as well as in Ottawa and Toronto attracted over 4,000 people.

The first information session in Winnipeg Nov. 21 drew 54 people. One of the organizers, Toby Vinsky, reported that a second session on Nov. 25 attracted another 30 people and that she has since been approached by others who are interested.

Vinsky and her co-organizers, Barbara Goldenberg and Nelly Wynberg, did not know each other before they started to work on the Bornstein registry.

Vinsky and Goldenberg were made aware of Bornstein's need through friends.

Wynberg, who has been living in Winnipeg for about three months, said: "I heard about the drive in Toronto. I contacted Jeff's parents asking how I could help. They directed me to the Canadian Blood Services office here, who put me in touch with Barbara and Toby."

"It only takes one match," said Wynberg, who noted that Bornstein's parents and two sisters are not the right match.

"A second benefit of this campaign is that there has been a significant increase in the number of people registered in Canada," Wynberg said.

Reichmanns pitch Technodôme for Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Albert Reichmann and his nephew Abraham Reichmann were in town recently to talk up the $1.05-billion Technodôme. The big indoor recreation and entertainment complex they are proposing to build in Montreal.

The Reichmanns, who are known to shun publicity, spoke about their mega-project to 800 members of the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Montreal, sharing the spotlight with a wise-cracking robot of gleaming chrome.

Little had been heard about Technodôme since the Toronto-based Reichmann family announced last spring that they wanted to build the project, originally slated for a site in Toronto, to Montreal

The City of Montreal, seeing the tourism potential, loved the idea. In fact, executive committee member Saulie Zajdel, an Orthodox Jew himself, has been a broker between the city and the Reichmanns. The question now is whether the federal government, which owns the Port of Montreal land where the Reichmanns want to build, will accept their offer.

Nevertheless, Abraham felt confident enough to declare: "It's real, it's here, and we will all benefit."

The Technodôme will open in mid-2002, he said, and construction will begin next summer, if the deal goes through.

Later, the younger Reichmann, who is president and chief operating officer of Heathmount A.E. Corp., said the company made a "firm offer" in June to the federal government, and that he hopes to receive a response in the next few weeks.

He made clear that this site, located west of the Old Port and across from Cité du Havre, is the only one they are interested in here and that, in Canada, Montreal is the only site being considered.

Abraham Reichmann, the 36-year-old son of Ralph Reichmann, has been working on a project of this type for 10 years and has looked at locations abroad, he said.

The Reichmanns denied anything went wrong in Toronto, they just think Montreal is "better."

"Montreal is a world-class city because of its people and culture," Abraham Reichmann said. "Montreal is absolutely the right place to do this."

The Quebec government has come on board. The Société générale de financement (SGF), a provincial investment agency, is committed to making a direct equity investment of up to $50 million in the Technodôme, said chair Claude Blanchet.

Blanchet noted that the SGF is required to make a financial return on its investments, and that over the past five years it has averaged 14.1 percent. He is convinced the Technodôme will be profitable and a major boon to the economy.

Albert Reichmann

"Montreal has seen nothing this important since [Expo] 1967," he said. Market studies project 6.7 million visits to the Technodôme annually. During construction, the project will create 14,000 direct and indirect jobs, and 6,500 people will be employed there when it's in operation, he said.

Abraham Reichmann said several "prominent" corporations are also interested in becoming partners in the project, but he declined to name any.

Blanchet said these businesses are prepared to put in "many millions of dollars."

Whatever the final financing, Albert Reichmann, who is Heathmount's chair and chief executive officer, said his family will retain majority control.

As another selling point, Abraham Reichmann stressed that the Technodôme will generate nearly $300 million in tax revenue: $150 million for Ottawa, $120 million for Quebec, and almost $30 million for Montreal.

He also predicted that his company, its sponsors and Tourism Montreal would spend $100 million per year promoting the Technodôme.

According to the plans, visitors will be able to practise such sports as bobsledding, snowboarding, snorkeling and mountain-climbing year-round in the 1.8 million square-foot-Technodôme, or take in entertainment based on themes like Las Vegas, New Orleans, Broadway and Hollywood, all made possible by the latest multimedia technologies.

"This is what people are asking for," Abraham Reichmann said. "They want the best, the biggest, the most exciting, the most advanced facility of its kind."

Heathmount was established in 1990 to develop amusement parks. The company is also looking at a site for another entertainment centre in New York City.

The Reichmann family's main business is Olympia & York, a leading developer of commercial properties internationally.

Gothic chanukiyah created for Kingston shul

KINGSTON, ONT. — A striking, Gothic chanukiyah conceived and crafted by one of Canada's finest ironsmiths will light the upcoming Chanukah celebration at Beth Israel Congregation here.

Beth Israel member Daniel Kerem, a resident of Godfrey, just north of Kingston, is a master craftsman trained in Germany and Austria. In a national competition, he was selected to refurbish the iron gates of Parliament Hill, in Ottawa.

When his mother Rose passed away in March 1998, Kerem set out to create a Judaic work worthy of her memory. He decided on a chanukiyah in the Gothic style of the late 15th century.

The pre-Renaissance-style chanukiyah is a rare sight – a tour de force of both art and research. Since no medieval chanukiyot are known to have survived, Kerem's design draws on several illuminations in old Hebrew manuscripts and on candelabra and torchiers in treasuries and museum collections.

The result is an ornate iron and brass menorah that stands six feet high and weighs some 300 pounds. It features leafy branches and twined grape clusters and stands on a base of three stylized feet.

"Gothic art must invoke a devotional aspect, and while rich and ornate, must also imply austerity," says Kerem. "It is the only European style to combine and harmonize these two extremes."

Beth Israel is a growing Orthodox congregation of 140 families, established in Kingston in October 1910.

Apple sauce is comfort food

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

In the midst of preparing all those home-made cookies and potato pancakes we need for Chanukah there is one food item that, while necessary for the latkes (in my opinion), is often overlooked. Yes, I'm talking about the applesauce. It's that wonderful comfort food we all use to garnish the latke when sour cream isn't available.

Making applesauce is easy, and the following recipes can be whipped up in no time. For the most part, you won't even have to go to the store for any ingredients.

APPLESAUCE (master recipe)

Wash, pare, and core 8 cooking apples. Add about ½ water and ⅛ tsp. salt. Cook in covered pot until soft. Add about ½ cup sugar while hot. Simmer just long enough to melt sugar. Amount of sugar and water varies with sweetness and juiciness of apples.

For additional flavour, add with sugar, nutmeg, cinnamon, grated lemon rind or juice, or a combination of spices. Makes 8 servings

Applesauce Variations

Honey Applesauce: In master recipe, substitute ½ cup honey for sugar. Add 1 to 2 tsp. grated lemon rind.

Minted Applesauce: In master recipe, add ¼ cup chopped mint with sugar.

Orange Applesauce: In master recipe, add 2 to 3 tsp. grated orange rind with sugar.

Spiced Applesauce: In master recipe, substitute ⅓ cup firmly packed brown sugar for granulated sugar. Add ¼ tsp. cinnamon and 1 tsp. grated lemon rind.

BAKED APPLESAUCE

6 to 8 tart apples
cinnamon to taste or 2 thin slices lemon
⅔ cup water
about ¼ cup sugar (you can use brown sugar if you like)

Wash apples (do not peel), remove bruised spots, and cut in quarters.

Place the cut apples in an ungreased baking dish. Add the cinnamon or lemon, and water. Mix well, cover with foil and bake at 375 until tender, 20 to 30 minutes. Place the mixture through a strainer and then add the sugar. Mix well. This is great either hot or cold. Serves 6 to 8.

CRANBERRY APPLE BUTTER

6 lbs. McIntosh apples, quartered and cored
½ cup water
2 cups cranberries
1 cup sugar
2 tsp. honey

In a large cast-iron casserole, combine the apples and water. Cover and cook over moderate heat, stirring often, until soft, about 20 minutes. Uncover and cook on low heat, stirring occasionally, until it forms a thickened puree, about 45 minutes. Meanwhile, in a medium saucepan, cook the cranberries with sugar over low heat, stirring occasionally, until a thick puree forms, about 15 minutes. Pass cranberry puree through a coarse strainer. Then pass the apple puree through a coarse strainer and return it to casserole.

Cook over moderately low heat, stirring occasionally until very thick, about 15 minutes. Add the honey and the cranberry puree and stir until blended. Transfer the apple butter to a heatproof bowl and cool completely.

APPLESAUCE RECIPE #1

8 tart apples
water ½ cup sugar
salt
1 tsp. lemon juice
⅛ tsp. lemon rind
⅛ tsp. cinnamon

Wash, pare, core, and slice the apples. Place the apples in a large saucepan. Add water (1 cup water to 1 quart apples). Simmer until the apples are tender 30 to 45 minutes. Stir in sugar, dash of salt, lemon juice, grated lemon rind, and cinnamon or nutmeg. Taste; add more sugar if you like a sweeter taste. Cook a few more minutes and then remove from heat. Cool and then refrigerate for several hours. Serve cold. This is a thick applesauce. Serves 6.

BLENDER APPLESAUCE

¼ cup liquid (fruit juice or water)
4 apples cut in eighths
¼ cup sugar
⅛ tsp. cinnamon

Put the liquid and 4 or 5 pieces of apple into the blender container, cover and process at puree until smooth. Push blend button, remove feeder cap and add remaining apples, a few at a time. Add the sugar and cinnamon. Makes about 2 cups.

APPLESAUCE RECIPE #2

½ cup boiling water
2 lbs. cooking apples, peeled, cored and sliced
⅛ tsp. ground cinnamon
⅛ tsp. ground cloves
½ cup sugar

In 2-quart saucepan over medium heat, heat first 4 ingredients to boiling. Reduce heat to low; cover and simmer 8 to 10 minutes until the apples are tender for chunky applesauce, 12 to 15 minutes for smoother applesauce. During last minutes of cooking time, stir sugar into applesauce mixture. Makes 4 cups.

Wheel-Trans heading to Pearson Airport

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — TTC Wheel-Trans will take passengers to Pearson International Airport for the first time, starting in January.

"We will do it for a six-month trial period and then report back to the commission," said Bob Thacker, general superintendent for Wheel-Trans operations at a recent meeting at the Bernard Betel Centre.

In response to questions regarding delays reported by Bernard Betel members while waiting for Wheel-Trans vehicles, Thacker said that these have been due to the taxi industry which has responsibility for 40 percent of Wheel-Trans trips.

"They pick up their assignments the night before but often don't pick up their passengers in rush hour on busy days and don't let us know until after the time when they should have made a pick-up."

To correct this situation, the TTC is making adjustments which will see fewer Wheel-Trans pick-ups in the next few weeks, but they will be on time, he said.

Fifty percent of the TTC's fleet of buses will be accessible to disabled persons, and a total of 28 subway stations will have elevators by 2004.

Regarding a complaint from a Bernard Betel member that blind people are not eligible for Wheel-Trans, Thacker said all applicants are personally interviewed and those blind persons with mobility problems are approved.

"But this does not take into account the older people who are blind who do not have training in how to use the TTC system," said Sheila Zane, Bernard Betel social action co-ordinator.

Low-floor buses introduced on Bathurst Street are a step in the right direction, but so far these buses are in a minority, Zane said.

As the result of a recommendation from the social action committee, seniors who are not eligible for Wheel-Trans can hold up a blue card if they want a Bathurst Street bus driver to lower the floor, or make other adjustments, so they can gain easier admittance.

There are enough low-floor buses that in rush hour, one of every two buses on Bathurst Street is accessible, Thacker said.

He also said the system is trying to work out a plan so that passengers from other transit lines in York region will not have a long wait at the transfer station in Centerpoint mall at Yonge and Steeles.

"My astonishing true story"
"How I lost 64 lbs. and gained my self-confidence"

My name is Tania Olsson. I dropped 64 lbs. of fat in 11 short months. I lost 30 pounds twice with weight loss drugs. My weight shot back up so fast it made my head spin. One day a close friend encouraged me to try hypnosis. The free screening was like a ray of sunshine. I signed up and lost 64 lbs. in 11 short months. I lost ten inches off my waist. My dress size plunged from a bulging 22 to a sleek size 12. I know I will never, ever gain the weight back. Now that I'm thin and happy with my body, I can't think of a single reason to overeat. Hypnosis was the smartest investment of my life.

Dementia research results in Baycrest Centre award

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People diagnosed with dementia may benefit from new research indicating that some parts of the brain may replicate themselves, according to Dr. Melvyn J. Ball.

The research is being supervised by Ball, who is a professor of pathology at Oregon Health Science University (OHSU).

A former Torontonian, Ball, in 1979, was the first winner of the Munk Award in Geriatrics from Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care; he used the award to study for six months at Hebrew University in Israel.

Ball's lab has shown that certain nerve cells in the brain may be able to regenerate in late life.

"Enhancing such replicative neuronal capacity may someday soon offer enormous therapeutic potential for victims of Alzheimer's disease," Ball told The CJN.

Recent studies have found that by age 65, at least 10 percent of North Americans experience some significant impairment of memory, he said. By age 85, nearly 50 percent may have full-blown organic dementia, most commonly Alzheimer's disease.

The research at OHSU was done with several hundred people age 85 and older, Ball said.

Pain management centre opens

TORONTO — Adults suffering from chronic, disabling pain disorders can now get a wide range of treatment from one medical team at one location, the Wasser Pain Management Centre, which officially opened today at Mount Sinai Hospital.

The newly renovated facility brings together a wide spectrum of health care professionals, such as neurologists, scientists, psychiatrists and dentists to enhance patient care.

The Wasser Pain Management Centre expands on services previously offered by Mount Sinai Hospital's craniofacial pain and headache research unit. Bringing the medical professionals together in one department creates an improved level of interaction between scientists and clinicians, enhancing the bench-to-bedside concept for the patients' benefit. With the closely monitored clinical environment of the centre, staff are willing to use strong drugs to manage serious cases of pain.

"Through the generosity of the Wasser family and others, we can now provide faster and more aggressive care to the benefit of the patient," said Dr. Allan Gordon, a neurologist and the director of the new centre.

The Wasser Pain Management Centre has been made possible through a generous $1 million donation from Larry Wasser and family to Mount Sinai Hospital's The Best Medicine campaign.

The Best Medicine was a huge success, making Mount Sinai the first Canadian hospital to raise $100 million in a fundraising campaign. It reached the milestone last June. The goal has since been extended to $125 million.

Caring for aging relatives

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A report that a silent army of 2.1 million Canadians is struggling to care for aging relatives and friends strikes home with the Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS).

"It's a fact of life, both professionally and personally," said Fay Geitzhals, JF&CS supervisor of intake workers.

A Statistics Canada report said two-thirds of the caregivers are juggling time at work by coming late or leaving early, missing days or adjusting work schedules.

"That reflects our experience," said Geitzhals. "We hear from people who have elderly parents and who are struggling financially because their parents' pensions do not cover the costs of caring for them."

The Statistics Canada report says the caregivers suffer psychological, emotional and health problems, postpone job opportunities and have extra expenses.

The stress is hardest on women because they don't cut back on the other demands in their lives. They simply add eldercare to their duties, the report stated.

Iran increasing weapons flow to terrorists: U.S.

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — U.S. officials are accusing Iran of sending arms shipments to terrorist organizations, as part of Tehran's effort to sabotage the peace process, the Washington Post has reported.

After the failure of American efforts to develop better relations with Iran, senior government officials have come to the conclusion that there has been no change in Iranian policy in regard to terror under the presidency of Ali Khatemi and that, because of the regional threat Iran thus constitutes, it is incumbent upon Washington to continue its hard-line policy toward the Islamic Republic.

The newspaper reported that American sources and others with access to intelligence sources have determined that Iran is accelerating its firearms and explosives shipments to Hamas, and co-ordinating the activities of various terrorist groups that, until now, have been acting separately, and ordering attacks on Israeli and Jewish targets abroad.

"It's liable to be a nightmare for Israel," one senior source was quoted as saying, "a car bomb in Israel [being] simultaneous with attacks in Singapore."

Government sources stress that there had not been a direct connection between the Hamas and Iran before, but that the situation has changed over the last 18 months. Most Iranian support for Hamas comes through Jordan. Most of the evidence on the Iran-Hamas connection was revealed by recent Jordanian raids on Hamas party activists.

Washington is particularly worried by the evidence of co-ordination, with Iranian encouragement, between Hamas and Hezbollah. The organization of Ahmed Jibril, another member of the Damascus-based group that opposes peace with Israel, has also joined in the co-ordination.

The newspaper quotes American and Israeli sources who point to the inclusion of long-range Katyusha rockets in Iran's shipments to Hezbollah. The rockets are able to reach the outskirts of Haifa.

Israeli intelligence reported two weeks ago that Iranian artillery experts had been sent to Lebanon to train Hezbollah fighters in using the new weapons. Up to now, the organization has made use of portable hand-held Katyushas, not artillery barrels.

The new activity is raising fears that Hezbollah is planning to continue its attacks against Israel even in the event of a peace treaty between Israel and Syria.

The American sources say that European states are in agreement with the assessment of Iranian activities, and that it was the focus for discussions by anti-terrorism advisers at a recent meeting in Berlin of the G-8 nations.

The Americans arrived at the conference with files full of intelligence material and the aim of convincing the Europeans of the increasing threat posed by Iran, an aim that turned out to be easier than expected. Both the British and the Germans also presented damning material on Iran, and concurred with the U.S. assessment.

Israel, PA to set borders in framework pact

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinian Authority have come to an understahding that the framework agreement between the sides will outline permanent borders between the two entities, a senior Israeli source said last week.

"Both sides would like to know exactly where the border will be, for internal and other reasons, and neither side is willing to leave the borders vague until the final status arrangement," the source said.

The source said the complete drawing-up of border lines would be left to negotiations on the final status agreement, scheduled to end in September 2000. The framework agreement will, however, already include a detailed list of the Jewish settlement clusters that will remain, as well as a solution to the Jerusalem problem.

"Reading the framework agreement, one will be able to draw the permanent border between Israel and the Palestinian Authority," the source said.

The negotiating teams, headed by Oded Eran and Yasser Abed Rabbo, have agreed on the format of the framework agreement due to be signed in February 2000.

"We are talking about a 10 to 15 page document, which, in certain articles, will present only basic principles, while others will be more detailed, outlining the permanent status arrangement," the senior source said.

Issues such as the borders, the Jewish settlements and Jerusalem will be more detailed than the clause on security, which will present only general principles, the source said.

On the refugee issue, the sides will try to outline the type of compensation and rehabilitation mechanism that will be offered to Palestinian refugees, but the detailing of costs will be left to the permanent settlement talks.

The talks on the framework agreement have, to date, included seven full forum meetings, held alternately in Ramallah and Neve Ilan, and private meetings between Eran and Abed Rabbo.

The first month of the talks was dedicated to enabling the negotiators to get to know each other and develop good "chemistry" while they presented their opening positions.

The Israeli delegation objected to an exchange of written drafts for the framework agreement, arguing that the gaps between the two sides were still too wide and that going into details at too early a stage could stall the entire process.

"The ground must be set for the presenting of drafts," the senior Israeli source said, suggesting that drafts would be presented within the coming month.

At the opening of the talks, the representatives agreed on an agenda for the negotiations and an outline of the framework arrangement. Each side then began presenting its positions on the various components of the agreement. So far, both sides have presented their security proposals, Israel has proffered its economic outlook, and this week, the Palestinians will outline their proposed solution for the refugee problem.

• The borders – The Palestinians are demanding a full Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, based on UN Security Council Resolution 242.

Israel objects to this proposal, arguing that the border should be drawn according to the placing of settlement clusters and security considerations.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak is willing to give the Palestinians more "qualitative" territories, so as to guarantee the Palestinian entity territorial continuity in return for the "quantity" of territories annexed to Israel.

• Statehood – The Palestinians say that the status of their entity does not have to be included on the agenda because the right to self determination is a natural right.

Eran has said that Israel's position on this issue is "open to all options" and will be determined as a result of agreements reached on other issues.

• Security – Some progress has already been made on this front, according to the senior Israeli source, with the Palestinians announcing their recognition of "the asymmetry in the security needs of the two sides."

The source noted that "this opens the door to greater understanding, because if the needs are not identical then neither are the solutions."

Bombs shock S. Africa Jews

By SUZANNE BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — South African Jews are shocked along with the rest of the country after 48 people, including a former Jewish day school student, were injured in a pipe bomb attack in a coastal resort.

The recent bombing at a pizza restaurant follows a similar attack three weeks earlier in the Cape Peninsula, at a gay bar only a few miles away from the restaurant. That attack also injured a former day school student.

The attacks come amid a general increase in crime in South Africa. While Jews have not been specifically targeted, Jewish fears have sparked a growth in emigration.

Police have posted a reward for information that could lead to conviction of those responsible for the spate of bombings in the Cape Peninsula during the past 18 months.

Minister of Safety and Security Steve Tshwete said the act was "dastardly and cowardly. We will leave no stone unturned to apprehend the cowards."

Police believe the pipe bomb was triggered by dialing a cell phone attached to the device, which had been placed in a plastic bag under a table.

But for a quirk of fate

By EDDY KAPLANSKY
Special to The CJN

Nov. 29, 1947, was perhaps the most important day in over 2,000 years of Jewish history, as on that day, the rebirth of a Jewish state in the Land of Israel was given legal sanction by the United Nations.

When the news came that the General Assembly had adopted its Partition Plan for Palestine, Jewish communities the world over were overjoyed and the Jews of Eretz Yisrael danced in the streets.

Yet over the years, that date seems to have lost significance for successive generations of Jews, both in the Diaspora and in Israel. Although the cities of Bat Yam, Herzliya, Jerusalem and Ramat Hasharon all have a Kaf-Tet b'November (Nov. 29th) Street, chances are that few people under 60 who live on them know why their streets were so named.

This year, as in all recent years, Nov. 29 came and went without even a mention on Israel radio or television of the day's historical significance for the Jewish people.

The weeks leading up to Nov. 29, 1947, were full of tension and uncertainty for everyone interested in Palestine, especially for Jews whose dreams of a state of their own had eluded them for so long.

With a number of countries still undecided up to the very last moment whether or not to support the UN Partition Plan for Palestine, the two-thirds majority required for its adoption by the General Assembly was far from certain. The nations opposing the Partition Plan, led by Arab bloc countries, needed to convince only a few more delegates to vote No in order to ensure its defeat. It was a real cliff-hanger for weeks on end – the results were not predictable until about half the votes had actually been cast.

It appears that a gesture of gratitude by a celebrated and long dead Chinese leader, combined with a quirk of fate that put two Diaspora Jews in the right place at the right time, may well have helped turn the tide in favour of the resolution in the historic UN vote.

This snippet of history came to my attention when I interviewed Montreal's Sydney Shulemson about his clandestine activities for Israel in the War of Independence era. The ex-RCAF pilot, who is Canada's most highly decorated Jewish serviceman of World War II, was very busy in 1948 recruiting volunteers and acquiring military hardware for the nascent Israel Defence Forces. When I mentioned to Shulemson that the fledgling Israel Air Force's fleet included two de Havilland Mosquito airplanes, he recalled the following incident in which he had been involved by pure chance.

Sometime in November 1947, Shulemson learned that China had done nothing with some 200 war-surplus Mosquitos it bought from Canada the year before, and the news prompted him to look into the possibility of acquiring some of these excellent battle-proven warplanes for the future Jewish Air Force.

With this in mind, he asked his friend Harry Clark for an introduction to the legendary ex-Chinese General Morris "Two Gun" Cohen, who was living in Montreal at the time, after having recently married Harry's sister Judith.

Originally from England, Cohen had achieved international renown after years of service in China as personal bodyguard to Dr. Sun Yat Sen, hero of the 1912 revolution, and later as military adviser to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. Cohen was captured by the Japanese during World War II and repatriated to Canada in a 1943 prisoner of war exchange.

Cohen agreed to help try to acquire the planes and telephoned the Chinese ambassador in Ottawa to arrange a meeting. After the phone call, Shulemson expressed doubt about getting any help from the ambassador, who was also China's delegate to the United Nations, because the ambassador had publicly announced that China would vote against the Partition Plan at the forthcoming UN General Assembly meeting.

This news came as a surprise to Cohen, but he nevertheless expressed optimism because of a letter given to him many years earlier by Sun Yat Sen. He explained to Shulemson that the letter, which was written in gratitude for Cohen's long and faithful service, stated in part that China would never do anything that would be harmful to the Jewish people.

When they met with the ambassador a few days later, Cohen showed him the letter. After some discussion in Chinese between the two, the ambassador finally agreed not to oppose the resolution at the General Assembly meeting. Thus it was that instead of voting against the Partition Plan, China cast an abstention.

At 33 for and 13 against, plus 10 abstentions, China's vote was in itself not crucial to the outcome of the General Assembly vote. But the example of China (the world's most populous country and a founding member of the UN) abandoning its original negative stance may well have swayed a few undecided delegates to vote Yes, thus assuring the needed two-thirds majority approval.

The Israel Air Force never got those Mosquitos from China. Shulemson doesn't know why or when the matter was dropped, as it was out of his hands once he informed the Haganah people in New York. Shulemson's information was probably just not acted upon, as the Haganah's Air Service (the IAF's predecessor) had only recently been created – on Nov. 10, 1947.

What a world of difference even one squadron of those superb Mosquito warplanes would have made to the airplane-hungry IAF in those desperate days. Nevertheless, Cohen and Shulemson's trip to Ottawa was apparently not in vain.

Former Montrealer Eddy Kaplansky, who lives in Haifa, was an IAF pilot in the War of Independence. He is closely associated with the IAF Historical Branch as a researcher of the War of Independence era.

Riding into orbit on a Russian rocket

BY ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

It may sound like science fiction, but, in just a few months, Russia will launch an Israeli military satellite into space.

Commentary

Even more surprising is the fact that, after hearing Israel's rationale, the Americans gave their consent to this extraordinary undertaking. The truth is that the Americans ought to be quite pleased by this joint Russian-Israeli project.

For two years, Israel has been trying to persuade the American government not to allow American companies to launch commercial satellites on Russian rockets, which are considered the least expensive.

The reason: to put pressure on Russia to reduce its aid to Iran in developing missiles and nuclear power. The launch of an Israeli satellite on a Russian rocket will certainly bring about a lessening of the Israeli pressure on Congress regarding American launches in Russia.

The Russian-Israeli deal attests to an Israeli weakness when it comes to the sensitive area of space projects. In April 1995, Israel successfully launched the Ofek military satellite.

This satellite has yielded excellent results. Many who formerly expressed opposition or skepticism about the need for a satellite have since been seeking to share in the benefits it has produced.

But, though doubts about the satellite have disappeared, when decision time on funding for the development of a more advanced satellite came around, everyone expected another source to come up with the money.

Apart from the satellite itself, which would function as a more advanced camera, an additional objective is to build large launchers that, in contrast to the norm, would be capable of launching the satellite westward, counter to the earth's orbit, and not over the Arab countries.

The budgets were initially reached in patchwork fashion, with the result that development was done piecemeal and not with several systems all working in tandem.

The money for the satellite production has been found, but delays were unavoidable. Now that the Ofek satellite is past its prime, many people believe that Israel cannot wait any longer, lest we fall behind strategically. This is what brought Israel to the Russians.

The Russian-Israeli partnership is also giving rise to stiff opposition within the political-security establishment. Granted, the project was carried out through a private company registered in the United States, in which Israel Aircraft Industries, El-Op Electro-Optic Industries and an American company are partners. The American company has commercial aspirations that go beyond the launch of a single Israeli satellite.

The opposition in Israel is not directed at the satellite or at Israeli activity in space. It is based on the argument that partnership with the Russians will undermine Israel's struggle against Iran's missile and nuclear projects.

It is no coincidence, opponents say, that Washington so easily accepted Israel's explanations. The demand that the United States put pressure on Russia and keep it from making profits from the launch of American satellites will seem ludicrous and morally bankrupt when Israel is making a similar deal with the Russians.

The Ofek satellite

What right does Israel have to demand of American companies that they refrain from doing the very thing it is doing itself? When Israel seeks to apply such pressure, the Russians, too, will react as if the whole thing is being done with a wink and is not something to be taken seriously.

The common denominator between Israel and the American companies on this issue is the desire to launch a satellite at the cheapest price. Other countries, such as France and China, are capable of launching satellites.

Today, Israel would be wary of doing a space deal with the latter because of current American sensitivity on the matter of its relations with China. The French, on the other hand, could be good candidates, but they cost more than the Russians and their launch timetable is slower.

Nonetheless, alternative proposals should not brushed aside, and meanwhile, Israel should better prepare itself for the future.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 29

• Israel media reported that U.S. President Bill Clinton signed a budget bill that includes nearly $3 billion in annual aid to Israel and nearly $2 billion to help Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) implement last year's Wye accord.

Nov. 30

• Israel's state prosecutor said it is likely charges will be brought against Ofer Nimrodi, the former publisher of Ma'ariv, suspected of plotting the murder of two rival publishers and a private detective.

• Before ending a six-day trip in Israel, Li Peng, the leader of the Chinese Parliament, secretly visited Israel Aircraft Industries to observe a surveillance plane being built for Beijing, according to Ha'aretz. Author's debut novel an upbeat, funny book

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Whereas writers of first novels often agonize over finding a publisher, that was not the case for Elyse Friedman, 36, of Toronto, who has produced four screenplays and much comic material for radio and television.

Friedman's first novel, Then Again, was snapped up by Random House, which has championed the book and is giving it serious promotion. The book is on prominent display in many bookstores and Friedman has already had discussions about turning it into a film.

Then Again is an offbeat, funny book, which is perhaps not surprising for an author who crafted comedic sketches for CBC Radio's Definitely Not the Opera for two years. The story opens with an invitation that Michelle Schafer, the first-person narrator, receives from her brother Joel to attend a "blast-from-the-past" party in their family's former home in suburban Toronto.

This is the house that Michelle knew from her childhood. She and her sister Marla return to find that Joel, a lover of weird stunts and practical jokes, has restored the house exactly as it looked in the 1970s. Furthermore, he has hired look-alike actors to impersonate their deceased parents.

Elyse Friedman

Interspersed with descriptions of the house as Michelle discovers it are flashbacks of a romantic relationship. In keeping with its bizarre premise, the story escalates to a surprise and dramatic ending.

Friedman, who grew up in the Bayview-Steeles area of North York and moved as a teenager to the Annex, says she can't remember where the idea for the story emerged. "It just popped into my head," she said. "I'm the kind of person who dwells on the past: I like to walk or drive around places where I've lived before. So it's possible it came from that, and from wondering what it would be like to go back to the house where you were raised."

Again not surprisingly, the book contains a Jewish element. The three siblings are Jewish and their father was a Holocaust survivor. "The awareness of his past is always present in the house, and I think it has a definite lasting effect on the children. It's part of what shaped their characters."

(Friedman is also a playwright. Her first play, Jews Don't Camp – How I Tried to Become a WASP and Failed, was produced by a Winnipeg theatre group several years ago.)

She wrote the novel, she said, because "I wanted to talk about the lingering effects on the children of Holocaust survivors. There's a residue that remains and has an effect on the children. I also wanted to explore the idea of subjective memory – how different siblings can have different takes on the same environment."

Then Again is not necessarily a satire on suburban life, according to its author. "What I tried to do in a couple of spots is show that the suburbs are not as normal as they appear to be on the surface," she said.

"Having been raised in the suburbs, I find that there's a desire there to have everything appear normal. But when you get in the front door, beyond the surface, you find that people are just as insane as anywhere else. I'm not a big fan of that kind of living."

Her family's reaction? "My brother and sister, they both love the book, they think it's great. And my father also thought it was wonderful. There are some bits of autobiographical stuff in the book, but it's not really about them. So there was nothing too contentious for them."

Then Again, at 190 pages, is available in bookstores for $29.95.

A tour of 'literary' Toronto

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

A year after Isaac Bashevis Singer came to the United States, he was required to renew his visa from outside the United States. Rather than return to Poland, he snuck into Toronto.

In case you missed reading about Singer's 1936 visit here in his reminiscence Lost in America, the episode is recounted at length in Toronto: A Literary Guide, the extremely well-researched and highly readable work by Greg Gatenby, founding director of the International Harbourfront Authors Festival.

While in Toronto, Singer visited the Spadina garment district, finding in it myriad reflections of his beloved Krochmalna Street in Warsaw. "It was odd," he wrote, "that having crossed the Atlantic and smuggled myself over the border I found myself in a copy of Yiddish Poland." He even contemplated staying in Toronto.

Gatenby, an amazingly thorough researcher, leaves hardly any stones unturned in his quest for details about the literary history of Toronto. His book is large — more than 600 pages, crammed with intriguing information and rare photographs — and contains items of interest on nearly every page.

One doesn't read a book like this for details about Jewish writers in particular, of course. But the marvel is that there's so much here about the local and international Jewish literary scenes.

Each of the chapters focuses on a street and neighbourhood and is structured as a walking tour. The chapter on Marlee Avenue mentions the anecdote about Singer in connection with his later appearance (1962) at the old Jewish Public Library on Glen Park Avenue.

The chapter focusing on Kensington Market tells us that the distinguished Yiddish novelist Joseph Opatoshu spoke in 1934 at the Labour Lyceum, 346 Spadina Avenue, on Palestine and Soviet Russia. Three years later, American expatriate author Emma Goldman also lectured at the Labour Lyceum on Youth in Revolt. (In 1945, Opatoshu spoke again at the Labour League Mutual Benefit Society, 7 Brunswick Ave., to officers of the Canadian Jewish Congress.)

Typical of most chapters, the Vaughan Road "tour" points out residences and points of interest related to a spectrum of writers from the well-known to the obscure, the contemporary to the historic. This chapter alone mentions such scribes as Nathan Cohen, David Lewis Stein, Lawrence Garber, Anne Michaels, Janis Rapoport, Charles Israel, Cary Fagan and Joe Rosenblatt.

Gatenby chronicles the visits of many great writers, including Dickens, Twain, Emerson, Whitman, Faulkner, Ferlinghetti, Nabokov and Hemingway (who lived briefly on Bathurst Street north of St. Clair, in an apartment building now known as "the Hemingway").

This well-written encyclopedic compilation also informs us that Israel Zangwill, Sylvia Plath, Ilya Ehrenburg, Sholem Asch and many other fine Jewish writers visited and spoke in Toronto. (Astonishingly, Zangwill spoke at the King Edward Hotel.)

I found only a couple of what I would regard as significant omissions. First, the book ignores Emma Goldman's extensive history here, mentioning neither her apartment on Spadina Avenue nor the house on Vaughan Road in which she died in 1940.

Second, it elaborately chronicles the career of the Oxford-educated intellectual Goldwin Smith (1823-1910), detailing his strong influence on the cultural scene of Victorian Toronto and noting that he brought "an air of sophistication" to the city and helped raise the level of its intellectual discourse.

However, it fails to mention that Smith moonlighted as a promulgator of the anti-Semitic tract, Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Toronto: A Literary Guide, by Greg Gatenby, ($19.95), is published by McArthur & Company, and comes highly recommended.

Jewish mysticism focus of Dillard book

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

For The Time Being (Knopf, $22) is Annie Dillard's personal meditation on eternity, morality, mortality, the nature of divine justice and other philosophical issues. The book is a spiralling intellectual investigation that moves from the birth ward of a modern hospital to an archeological dig in China to various sites in Israel, including the Temple Mount.

Twenty-five years ago, Dillard won the Pulitzer Prize for Pilgrim at Tinker Creek, a roving exploration of a simple landscape, laden with scientific, metaphysical and esoteric insights. Now, as then, she seems to write the way a cubist paints, presenting diverse facets of a subject, each from a particular angle, and always confident of her ability to see eternity in a grain of sand.

In For the Time Being, she writes about the uniqueness of people and clouds, the randomness with which birth defects occur, and the suddenness with which mass death can destroy a community, as when a giant wave killed 138,000 Bangladeshis in the 1970s.

As if trying to understand the nature of infinity and God, she repeatedly juxtaposes the individual against the multitude, as though to ask: What significance can one person have on a planet of six billion? She also seems to question whether fate can be just. Do babies, for example, deserve to be born with defects?

Besides the highly subjective observations about Israel, the book may be of particular interest to many Jewish readers because of its focus on Jewish mysticism. Dillard seems fascinated with the lives and works of the chassidic masters, and even includes snippets from the Zohar and other kabbalistic works.

She makes her points obscurely, often through juxtaposition of ideas and rarely by stating them directly. For example, she writes: "Our sins have nothing to do with our physical fates. When you shell peas, you notice that defective germ plasm shrivels one pea in almost every pod."

In a public interview during the recent Harbourfront International Festival of Authors, Dillard insisted that she was as much interested in conveying "gags" as in pursuing a philosophical line of inquiry. But she acknowledged that the strong focus on the Baal Shem Tov and Chassidism was a serious choice.

"I brought in the boys who know," she said.

A Catholic, Dillard seems to be writing for a secular constituency with minimal familiarity with Jewish philosophy. Ultimately, For the Time Being seems like a scrapbook of her personal intellectual quest, one compiled with heavy reliance on the cut-and-paste keys of a computer keyboard.

Does it satisfy? That depends entirely on whether the reader is intrigued enough to follow this best-selling author down her peculiar and self-indulgent path.

Concert a magical evening

Chava Alberstein and The Klezmatics.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The voice of Chava Alberstein, Israel's answer to Joan Baez, filled virtually every nook and cranny of cavernous Roy Thomson Hall last week in a concert of melodious Yiddish, Hebrew and English songs.

Often accompanied by The Klezmatics, an iconic American group which has played a pivotal role in the revival of klezmer music, Alberstein was in fine form as she sang like a nightingale.

Her sonorous voice was sweet, yet strong.

There she was, a diminutive figure strumming a guitar, her flowing blonde locks juxtaposed against an all-black outfit.

Alberstein's repertoire was largely taken from The Well, a 1998 album inspired by the verse of 15 poets who could fill a treasury of Yiddish culture.

The themes of her songs were eclectic, encompassing the power of love, the lure of tradition, the necessity of belief, the wonder and uniqueness of children, the bitter memory of the Holocaust.

And Alberstein dedicated one song, lifted straight from the Bible, to the late Yitzhak Rabin.

In what was often a magical evening, she serenaded an appreciative audience with her deceptively captivating personality, soaring high and low and finding her mark.

In a joyful flurry of clap-along klezmer tunes, The Klezmatics preceded Alberstein on the stage by about 30 minutes, warming up by the crowd.

Lorin Sklamberg, the soulful vocalist, played the accordion. Alicia Svigals, a wisp of a woman with dark frizzy hair, was on violin. Rounding off the band were Paul Morrissett on bass/tsimbl, David Licht on drums and percussion, Frank London on trumpet, and Matt Darriau on reeds and woodwinds.

Like Alberstein, The Klezmatics ranged far and wide, offering a rowdy drinking song here and a reverential hymn to the imminence of the Messiah there.

All in all, this was a concert to savour. But sad to say, Roy Thomson Hall was two-thirds empty.

Artist's energy sustains her as she copes with tragedy

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Multimedia artist Tutzi Haspel-Seguin, who is 80-plus, is a human dynamo.

Bustling about her home/cum studio despite a recent painful fall, she points out paintings, sculptures, mosaics, pottery and stained glass.

Her output is astounding. Self-taught, Seguin notes with a grin, "I'm a general practitioner, not a specialist."

From a graceful bronze-like nude in cement fondue (her own mix) to whimsical chassidic silhouettes, the innovation and humour are decidedly engaging.

She is the recipient of national and international awards and has been featured in a video for Jan Tenant's Time of Your Life.

Seguin's energy has never been in doubt. Now it sustains her as she copes with unbelievable tragedy – the loss of all three children one after the other, a son Adrian to heart problems at only 18, and two grown daughters, Natalie and Yvonne, to cancer.

Together she and her husband George 94, face what they must, just as they have through 63 years of marriage.

They are thankful for two granddaughters, Kim, who shares her grandmother's gift and has exhibited jointly with her, and Laura, a naturopath.

To keep going, Seguin plunges into ongoing activity conducting workshops, doing public speaking, playing bridge, exploring new forms of artistic expression.

"Somehow," she says, "there is the instinct to fight for life. I don't know why. You have to hang on to whatever helps – religion, a hobby."

She is currently very involved rehearsing and performing with an intergenerational cast in a play, Life Without Labels, which examines the lives of youth and seniors with disabilities. It is being presented at several Toronto and District locations under the auspices of the Anne Johnston Health Station at Yonge Street and Montgomery Avenue.

The Seguins immigrated to Canada from Romania in 1938 and Tutzi, remembering the early years in Europe, sees bright images flitting across her inner screen, recalling the Gypsies of her homeland.

At the brink of a new century, she has embarked on a mission to record for the future, the colourful wanderers from the past.

Painting in oils and watercolours (she likes to experiment with different media for the same subject), she is detailing a people whom she believes are often unfairly maligned. "They have a hard life," she says, "struggling just to survive, yet they are so talented!"

She holds up a portrait of a woman playing a mandolin and another of one dancing. There is a flower seller, a man with a trained bear, a close-up of a fortune teller with penetrating eyes.

Brilliant hues, flowing skirts, wide pantaloons engender a surface romance, yet other portrayals, like the mother carefully picking lice from her child's head, show gritty realism.

"The Gypsies suffered and died in the concentration camps just like the Jews," Seguin affirms. "They also had numbers on their arms.'

Composer writes liturgical and secular works

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Being a female composer is a double-edged sword, says Helen Greenberg, who is a singer and a composer.

"On one hand, it is hard to break into the world of male performers although some men do prefer my work. On the other hand, the fact that I am female has worked in my favour in attracting women singers."

Greenberg says there is no inherent difference between music written by a man and that written by a woman. "Both men and women writers can be equally sensitive."

Born in Baltimore, Greenberg moved first to Montreal, and then, in 1967, to Toronto, where she began studying music and joined the Beth Tikvah Choir.

"I became a composer by default," she says. "I wanted to be a singer, but I had frequent upper respiratory infections and was out of commission so much of the time that is was impossible to forge a career as a singer."

Greenberg has written a large body of secular and liturgical works, mainly for solo voice with piano accompaniment, using Hebrew, Yiddish and English texts. They include song cycles, single songs, and choral pieces.

She has also composed music for solo wind instruments. Her music is widely performed throughout Canada, the United States, and Israel.

In 1992, renowned contralto Maureen Forrester paid tribute to Greenberg at a concert celebrating Beth Tikvah Synagogue's 25th anniversary. Forrester performed Greenberg's cycle of Yiddish songs titled Froyen Shtimme (Women's Voices).

Composer Helen Greenberg

It was written, Greenberg says, because she wanted to expose the public to magnificent poetry by women.

In 1996, Holy Blossom Temple Sisterhood commissioned a piece for voice and piano by Greenberg for Hannah's Prayer, in honour of their 75th anniversary.

Transcontinental Music Publication in New York is currently preparing a demo tape of Holocaust music they have previously published. Two of Greenberg's compositions, Royt Knospn Oyfn Shney (Red Petals in the Snow) and Dremlen Feygl (Dreaming Birds), will be included featuring Paulina Stark, a dramatic soprano who is one of the world's foremost interpreters of Jewish art music.

"The best part of being a composer," she says, "is not just the heady experience of a good performance – that only lasts for 10 minutes – but the people I've met and friends I've made at North American Jewish Choral Festivals, conventions of Reform Cantors, the Guild of Temple Musicians, and the people who choose my music and wish to [study] with me."

Greenberg has many stories to tell about her experience as a composer: She sold a copy of her Yiddish song cycle titled Dos Golden Fayfe to a woman from Boston. One of the poets whose works Greenberg set to music was Ida Maza.

The purchaser began to cry with joy when she saw the name of the poet, Greenberg says. It was the name of her mother's family in Montreal with whom her family had lost touch.

"I gave her the name of the poet's son, as the poet had died, and the entire family was brought back together."

After 31 years, Greenberg continues as a member of the Beth Tikvah Choir and is a member of the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir.

For the future, Greenberg says, "I just want to keep composing."

Singer aims at turning 20-somethings onto music of their roots

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Vladimir Radian is so convinced young Jews want to hear songs that tell of their Jewish roots, he's willing to gamble his career on it.

He believes there is a revival among young Jews for songs which tell their history

A singer, actor and poet, Radian, 39, wants to take his concert, Rohzlinkes and Almonds, on a coast-to-coast tour in Canada and the United States.

The Romanian-born singer, who came to Canada nine years ago, used to have a day job as a computer scientist. But he's given that up in favor of a new stage career.

"I want to sing songs, mostly in Yiddish, that are easy to access, that do not crush anyone with their importance, and which young Jewish people, in their early 20s, seem to love," he said.

He has appeared in such operas as, La Traviata, Un Bello in Maschera, La Boheme and Don Giovanni, and Broadway musicals such as The King and I, Fiddler on the Roof and Kismet.

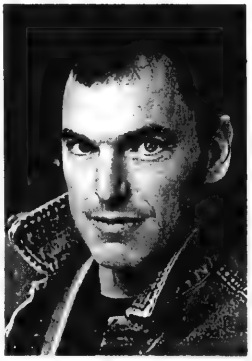
He has performed in Shakespearian dramas, among them, Henry V, Richard II and The Taming of the Shrew.

Lately Radian is doing more work as an actor and singer in film and television production, including movies, but his first love is still the stage, he said.

Through his poetry, Radian became a part of the history of his adoptive country, when his lyrics won CBC Radio's Maple Leaf Forever competition in 1997.

His lyrics became the new text of that traditional Canadian song.



Vladimir Radian

"I put in a little commentary from the Torah and in this way I get a direct connection. I'm surprised that it can be so attractive to them."

Radian's musical versatility has appeal, he said."My musical range is from bass to tenor, fairly freakish, but young people like it."

Half the repertoire of his recent concert at Yorkwoods Theatre – more than 200 people attended – consisted of traditional Yiddish songs.

The rest of the songs were chassidic, Israeli and well-known English tunes from American musicals. The selections included Belz, Papyrosan, Rohzlinkes and Almonds and If I Were A Rich Man from Fiddler on the Roof.

This is the show he would like to take on tour, he said.

Radian, who lived in Israel and taught computer science there for eight years, got his musical and acting training in Romania, and here in Toronto at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

Life is Beautiful now available in English

Life Is Beautiful has finally arrived on video. After an original July release date was postponed, the highly anticipated film should now be available in your local video store.

Not only has it been released in the original Italian version with English subtitles, but it is also available in a dubbed version. In fact, the video release was probably held up so that it could be dubbed into English for audiences that don't like to read subtitles.

Life Is Beautiful has always created a certain amount of controversy. Most people I have met loved the film. Personally, I have many reservations about the film, and I felt very uncomfortable watching it.

It is undeniable, however, that the film's success, both in North America and in Europe, has helped educate and inform millions of people about the Holocaust. For that reason alone, the film is worthwhile

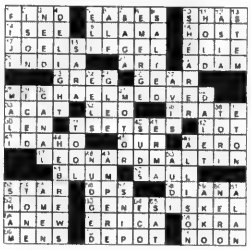
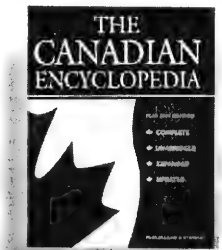
ANSWERS TO THIS WEEK'S CROSSWORD PUZZLE.



An encyclopedia for a Canadian reader

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor



The Canadian Encyclopedia 2000 edition is a veritable collection of items that are distinctly Canadian and written with a Canadian audience in mind.

After all, what other encyclopedia begins with the entry A mare usque ad mare and ends with Zurakowski, Janusz?

(The former, of course, is Canada's national motto, the latter – for trivia buffs – was a Russian-born pilot who was the first to test fly the Canadian Avro Arrow jet. He was honoured in 1996 when the Royal Canadian Mint issued a $20 commemorative coin with his image).

The penultimate entry will probably be more familiar with our readers – Zundel Case.

Everything in this 2,640 page tome is Canadian or defined with a Canadian perspective. The first sentence in the item Basketball for instance, reads: A team sport invented by Canadian James Naismith.

Other "Canadian" entries you're unlikely to find in the Brittanica are the 1970s Halifax-based rock band April Wine, and SCTV, the popular TV show that launched the career of John Candy, amongst others.

Strangely, although there are references to many nationalities, there is nothing for Israel or Israelis. But there is an entry on Jewish writing and a significant item on Jews.

As Canadians are quickly becoming "Americanized" by U.S. media and culture, this book brings a welcome Canadian perspective to over 10,000 entries.

My only beef is that despite 80 photographs and 160 illustrations, it is still very grey. It could use a lot more colour illustrations and photos.

It is published by McClelland & Stewart and sells for $64.99.

Chagall's Catholic burial site saddens writer

By SHEILA DROPKIN
Special to The CJN

I like to visit old cemeteries when I'm travelling.

Reading ancient tombstones can provide an insight into the world that was. The inscriptions tell of life as well as death, many of them providing a mini-history of the deceased and his or her time.

It is often through these inscriptions that one can determine when disaster struck an entire region — an earthquake or the plague, perhaps — and whether its inhabitants were wealthy and thriving or poor and struggling. How many died young and who lived to full maturity? Who died of natural causes and who suffered a mysterious fate? And, of course, what they don't tell, I fill in with my imagination.

But one comparatively recent tombstone that is in the midst of an old French cemetery made me feel sad and literally created a pain in my heart.

As I walked through the burial ground in St. Paul de Vence, a lovely small city north of Nice, this summer, I literally stumbled on Marc Chagall's grave. Since this was a Catholic cemetery and the artist had been Jewish, this was quite a shock to me.

While historically some Jews have been buried amongst non-Jews, for the most part, they were soldiers, killed in battle and buried with their comrades in sort of a non-denominational locale. The only other instances I know of involved Jewish spouses of non-Jews who were interred near each other.

Chagall died on March 28, 1985 (the day that, coincidentally, would have been my late mother's 80th birthday, perhaps another cause for my grief). A local tour guide informed me that he had lived in the town for the last years of his life and it was his wish to be buried there. Since there was no Jewish cemetery, he was buried where I stood.

Since we both doubted that a rabbi would have officiated at the burial, she guessed that it might have been the mayor, since Chagall was such a prominent individual and was admired by the entire town.

Chagall lived as a proud Jew and his art was imbued with ancient Jewish lore and law. The National Museum of the Marc Chagall Biblical Message, located in Nice, shows how important the Bible and Talmud were to him as a person and as an artist.

Among Chagall's most famous works of art are his whimsical depictions of the Jewish shtetls of eastern Europe and the 12 stained glass windows illustrating the Old Testament that were installed in the Hadassah Hospital of the Hebrew University Medical Centre in Jerusalem in 1962. His painting The Praying Jew is now the property of the Art Institute of Chicago.

My late mother loved his shtetl painting. While the one in which she was born and raised was in Poland rather than in Chagall's Russia, these small enclaves of Jewish life were very similar, no matter where they were located.

My mother rarely spoke of her childhood, but she loved her Chagall poster and said it reminded her of happy times, even though the local anti-semites ensured that they were few and far between. Life was usually difficult for these long-suffering Jews, but the artist was able to capture some of the pleasures that they enjoyed as well.

I guess it shouldn't really matter where anyone is buried (dead is dead, after all), and we encourage people of different cultures to live together. Nevertheless, I was saddened that this once-proud Jew, who had lived to the age of 98, should be buried amidst the crosses and angels that are anathema to the religion he practised.

However, I was pleased to see that his grave was covered by many small stones, indicating that there had been numerous Jewish visitors there before me, or people who knew of the Jewish tradition to place a stone or pebble on a grave as a sign that it had been visited.

I do hope he was buried wrapped in his tallit and wearing a kippah. It won't do anything for Chagall, but it would make me feel better.

Photos donated to breast clinic

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Twenty-two colourful photos donated by Toronto art photographer May Karp now hang in the waiting room of the recently opened breast clinic at Princess Margaret Hospital.

"Breast cancer is not unfamiliar in my family and I know what it is like to sit in the waiting room waiting – with all kinds of thoughts racing through your head," says Karp.

"I feel strongly that the atmosphere in that room is very important."

Karp said she worked all summer to prepare the photographs. The goal of her careful selection was to be "inclusive so that at this very difficult time, both patients and visitors could relate to what they saw on a variety of subjects and people that lived there."

Karp's photos include scenes from around the world. She captures architectural structures, nature's beauty, and interesting people. The collection includes photos of the Great Wall in China, the Thames in England, Talin, Estonia, a Florida beach, Bermuda and Prague.

Karp has sensitively caught the expressions of an eclectic group of people. And there are some photographs with humour such as Prickly Graffiti, and another depicting a love scene of two piglets in a tub.

Karp's photographs can be seen in other institutions and she has donated photographs to fund-raising events.

For example, she has donated 45 photographs to the new Home for the Aged at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care which is being constructed.

A photograph titled Pastoral Serenity hangs in the room that houses North America's first full-field digital mammography unit, which recently opened at Princess Margaret.

and its release on video will make it easily accessible to many more people.

At the same time, several other videos that will be of interest to Jewish audiences have been released on video as well. The Canadian film, The Assistant, is now available on video.

Featuring Gil Bellows, Armin Mueller-Stahl and Joan Plowright, The Assistant tells the story of a robbery that goes wrong during the depression era. One of the robbers (Bellows) feels remorse and returns to work for the Jewish store owner he robbed. He then falls in love with the store owner's daughter.

Although it is based on the novel by Pulitzer Prize winning author, Bernard Malamud, it received a theatrical run that was so short, and so obscure, that even I missed it. It later was shown on The Movie Network and has finally found its way onto video.

Although this is not one of the better Canadian films, the cast and the storyline make it worth viewing. Readers should be aware that this video is not appropriate for children.

Also recently available on video is the CBC television movie, White Lies. This is the story about a teenager who gets mixed up with a white supremacist cult. The girl eventually sees the errors of her way and attempts to leave her radical lifestyle. Sarah Polley gives an excellent performance in the lead role, ably supported by Lynn Redgrave, as the leader of the racist group.

The film received a great deal of publicity when it was first aired on television and was glowingly reviewed by most critics. It is a powerful film that should find a large audience on video.

It is available through VSC and stores can order it through any video distributor.

And finally, the acclaimed documentary recently telecast by TVO, The Nazis: Warning From History is now available in a six-cassette-box set.

Produced by the BBC in England and also telecast by the History Channel in the United States, this series featured the story of the rise of the Nazis under Adolf Hitler. Many of the popular myths surrounding the rise and fall of the Third Reich are exposed in this series.

Funds set up in Matti's memory

Her voice rising with emotion, Mrs. Baranovski, who was accompanied by Matti's father and stepfather, said she hopes "that those responsible face the courts as adults. Children do not kill children. Children do not kill."

Chanukah, she said, is a time to recall miracles, and it gives rise to the hope that the murder of her son "will be the absolute last."

She ended simply with, "I wish you all a happy Chanukah."

Rabbi Levi Jacobson of the Jewish Russian Community Centre read aloud messages of condolence sent by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Ontario Premier Mike Harris.

There will never be justice as long as the Young Offenders Act is not amended, said Police Services Board chair Norm Gardner.

"Legislators take pride in the compassion we afford to those who break our laws, who create intimidation, in acts of disorderly conduct and crime," Gardner said.

"Perhaps that compassion is too broad. There can still be compassion, but with a greater deal of discipline and punishment."

Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, announced CJC would set up a task force on youth violence, while Natan Aronshtam of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said UJA would establish a memorial fund for Jewish youth in Matti's name.

The Jewish Russian Community Centre will also set up a special fund to establish a youth and leadership program in Matti's memory.

Rabbi Joseph Zaltzman, the centre's executive director, said the only way out of darkness and evil is through daily good deeds and acts of kindness.

Rabbi Zaltzman lit the first candle on the menorah, followed by Matti's father, Vitaly Baranovski, Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter and local city councillor Mike Feldman.

Israeli judo champion teaching students in Toronto

By MICHAEL NOBLE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Liad Acco didn't expect to be spending this winter in Canada. Ten months ago, the seven-time Israeli judo champion and 1997 Maccabiah Games gold medallist was in Israel, training to regain his title and make a run at the Olympics.

Five months ago, following a neck injury, he was in South America clearing his head and preparing to go back to school. Today, he's in Richmond Hill, a judo instructor at Impact Centre martial arts.

Acco's northward turn came suddenly this past summer. The 23-year-old was travelling in Costa Rica when he heard that his former judo instructor, Moni Aisik, had offered him a job in Toronto.

Acco was surprised and honoured by the offer and quickly accepted. It would give him a chance not only to teach judo and train regularly but also to come full circle and work with his childhood mentor.

The future champion was only four years old in 1980 when he walked into Aisik's prestigious Maccabi Tel Aviv club. Under Aisik's tutelage, and later 1992 Olympic silver medallist Yael Arad, he soon blossomed into a young star, capturing three consecutive national titles at ages 11, 12 and 13.

At 14, he joined the Israeli national squad and two years later, in 1992, won his first Israeli championship as an adult. This began a run of four titles in six years, ending with consecutive victories in 1996 and 1997.

A bronze at the 1994 World High School Championships in France, and a gold medal at the 1997 Maccabiah Games round out his impressive resume.

Acco had planned to continue competing in and for Israel and make a run at the 2000 Olympics before a series of injuries got in the way. Knee surgery sidelined him for all of 1998 and after a strong start in early 1999, a neck injury again put him out of commission.

With Sydney out of reach, the young veteran came to the other side of the world, to teach.

In the army, Acco instructed Israeli Special Forces in hand-to-hand combat. Today he works mostly with children.

His current task is a challenging one. He is called upon to guide his students not just in the arts of judo but in the day-to-day challenges of growing up. Students often talk to him about problems they can't bring to anyone else.

"They bring me into their own lives. There are things that may not be comfortable for them to go to their parents with. So they come to me. This is all part of teaching."

Acco relates one occasion when a mother asked him to talk to her son because he was having trouble in school and, "he listens just to you."

Acco said, "She came after one week and she said 'It's a different boy, I don't know what you've done but it's a different boy.' This means a lot to me."

These days Liad Acco is focused on teaching, but that hasn't doused his competitive fire. He trains regularly, has already begun to compete, and at 23 years old, has yet to reach his prime. The future, like the past, is sure to be full of surprises. For now though, his Olympic hopes are on hold.

"This is a dream that for now I put in a little room and close it because now it's not possible for me. When I get another opportunity, I'll jump at it."

Liad Acco

Nancy Rubin

The Inside Back

Humanistic Jews reach out

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

It's not that Rabbi Sherwin Wine somehow lost his faith in God. It's that he never had any to start with.

As the founder of the modern Humanistic Judaism movement, Rabbi Wine is less concerned with God and Halachah than with reaching out and scooping up thousands of disaffected and unaffiliated Jews for whom Judaism has ceased to be a religion (or never was), but is rather is a cultural force – an expression of a great civilization – that must be nurtured, engaged in and perpetuated.

Few rabbis have caused a greater stir than this one. Back in 1963, while he was spiritual leader of the Birmingham Temple in suburban Detroit, Rabbi Wine and his followers "came out," so to speak, as a congregation of Jewish atheists, who elected to become officially humanistic the following year.

Today, Humanistic Judaism, which eschews religion and embraces cultural values that also stress the power of the individual to solve problems, claims 30,000 members in some 35 congregations worldwide, including such high-profile Jews as Prof. Alan Dershowitz and Yehuda Bauer, the Holocaust scholar.

Rabbi Wine's secular Judaism still raises hackles among many Jews, but he should not be sold short. He's an undeniably charismatic speaker who is just as concerned with Jewish survival as any believing pulpit rabbi. (He was also named by British Rabbi Dan Cohn-Sherbok as one of 50 key Jewish thinkers of the past 2,000 years, up there with Yehuda Halevi, Maimonides, the Baal Shem Tov and Theodor Herzl. Only four, including Rabbi Wine, are still alive.)

Now 71, Rabbi Wine, who was raised in a Conservative home and ordained a Reform rabbi, was in Toronto late last month to help launch this city's only Humanistic Jewish congregation, Oraynu, formerly the Secular Jewish Association. Over six weekend events and lectures, he attracted some 700 people, proof, he feels, that a large number of people are not being served by the Orthodox, Conservative, Reform or Reconstructionist movements.

Simply, Rabbi Wine and his fellow humanists feel there is more to Judaism than God.

Historically, he told The CJN in a wide-ranging interview, Jewish identity has been less a function of religion and more one of nationality and culture. That in turn led to two 20th-century movements: the Yiddishist, which was more or less destroyed in the Holocaust, and the Zionist, which proved to be the most successful nationalist movement of our time.

"Judaism became a set of theological beliefs, but historically that doesn't conform to the reality of what Jews are," he said. "In the Bible, Jews are a nation. When Orthodox Judaism determines the identity of a Jew, it doesn't apply a religious criterion. It's whether your mother is Jewish. That's not a religious criterion. Jewish identity is not matter of Halachah. It's a matter of birth.

"It's very clear," he went on, "that throughout Jewish history, Jews have viewed themselves as more than just a religious denomination. Defining Judaism as a culture and a civilization corresponds to the way Jews were viewed by Jews historically. To narrowly define it simply as set of theological convictions is to violate what has happened in Jewish history."

He sees secular Judaism as part of the continuum of non-halachic Judaism begun by the Reform movement. It was embraced by such early secular Zionists as Herzl, Max Nordau and David Ben-Gurion. Synagogue life, said Rabbi Wine, was not part of their lives, and not part of the lives of the two most famous Jews of the 20th century: Albert Einstein and Sigmund Freud, the former a great Zionist and the latter an intensely cultural Jew.

"The constituency to which Einstein and Freud belonged was not some bizarre little constituency," he said. "It remains a major constituency throughout the world."

The thread running throughout Jewish history is not monotheism or Halachah, he said, "but a commitment to survival."

And it's not the role of Humanistic Judaism to raid the other streams of Judaism, he assured. It's to reach those people who have not been reached by the other denominations, "and who will be lost unless they are."

"MESHUGA NUTS"

3 cups walnuts/pecans
2 extra large egg whites
1 cup granulated sugar
dash of salt
1/2 cup sweet butter, melted
1 tsp cinnamon

Bake nuts at 375°-400°F until lightly brown, approx. 10 minutes. Watch closely so that they do not burn.

Beat egg whites until stiff. Fold in cinnamon, sugar, and salt. Add nuts and melted butter.

Spread meringue mixture on a cookie sheet (no need to grease the sheet), and bake until light brown.

Stir and separate the nut mixture while browning. Again, you need to watch them closely. Bake the nut meringue for 10-15 minutes.

Place the separated nuts in a tight tin.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am 88 years old and was married for more than 60 years to a wonderful man who was completely devoted to me. Last month he passed away. It was sudden and unexpected. He took care of things in the house, including shopping and paying the bills. I am an invalid in a wheelchair. I have one son who is unemployed and very involved with his own family. He does not have much time for me. What should I do?

LFS

Dear LFS,

Your first step is to call your local social service centre and meet with a member of their staff who can help determine what you need and recommend various community resources such as home care, meals on wheels, and transportation services.

You might also want to consider exploring alternative living arrangements such as assisted living senior residences. These residences provide meals, housekeeping, recreational activities and sometimes nursing services.

Although this is a difficult transition period, rest assured that there are resources available to assist you and help enhance the quality of your life.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse represents the management and staff of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

No concessions made: Israel

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As preparations began for Israeli-Syrian peace talks in Washington this week, leaders here stated that Israel had made no concessions to Syria's demand for a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

"The government did not commit to anything or concede on any issues – not on settlements, water, the border line or the Lebanon issue. All of these issues will be discussed in the negotiations," Foreign Minister David Levy told Israel Radio.

Levy also stressed that Israel would never agree to the Syrian demand for an Israeli pullback on the Golan Heights to the line held by Damascus on the eve of the 1967 Six Day War.

"We will not go into an arrangement which means the line of the Galilee – period. I repeat the government announcement, which is known to all, that there's no return to the line of the Galilee or June 4, 1967," Levy told Army Radio.

The foreign minister's remarks followed U.S. President Bill Clinton's announcement last Wednesday that Israel and Syria would resume negotiations this week from where Donating organs is 'a noble thing'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To save a life through organ donation is one of the most noble things we can do, says Rabbi Reuven Bulka. Unfortunately, the Jewish community has "missed the boat," he believes.

"When you tell Jewish people that it's permitted to be involved in a transplant, they're always surprised," said the rabbi, who leads Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas Synagogue, an Orthodox congregation. "We haven't sensitized them to the notion that this is a commendable and praiseworthy thing to do."

Special Feature

Rabbi Bulka is chair of the organ donation committee of the Kidney Foundation for Eastern Ontario.

And although he has had congregants who have needed transplants, those cases arose after his involvement with the foundation and were not his motivation for becoming involved, he said.

For a long time, rabbinic authorities prohibited organ transplantation, said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation, at a session on Jewish Medical Ethics held earlier this year.

However, as it became evident that transplantation was less an experimental procedure and more a life-saving one, rabbinic opinion shifted, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Advice For Israel Tourists

OTTAWA — Canadians travelling to Israel, particularly the Old City of Jerusalem, should exercise "caution," the federal government said last week. In a travel information bulletin, the Department of Foreign Affairs said Canadian tourists in the region should carry identification at all times, avoid travel after dusk, travel on public transit, and avoid congregating at bus stops and other public places. Ottawa says the security situation in Israel and the Palestinian areas is "fragile and could change very rapidly," with potential for terrorist violence and sudden closures of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Ottawa said that while Israel is "well-prepared" for Y2K-related problems, "the expected influx of tourists will put additional pressure on the country's infrastructure." Canadians travelling between Dec. 15 and Jan. 31 are advised to be prepared for potential disruptions.

The government has issued Y2K readiness reports on several countries, including Israel, on its Web site.

Collins Loses Challenge

VANCOUVER — A judge has rejected the application by former North Shore News columnist Doug Collins that challenged the constitutionality of a section of the B.C. Human Rights Code. The court remitted Collins' challenge back to the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal, where he faces a complaint from local businessman Harry Abrams that his writings were anti-Semitic. The Pacific region of Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the court's decision.

ISRAEL

Law Won't Change

JERUSALEM — Israel will not amend the law guaranteeing immediate citizenship to Jews who move there, says the country's absorption minister. "We are not going to change the Law of Return," Yuli Tamir said at a news conference in Moscow during her three-day visit there last week. The issue has generated controversy in recent weeks, particularly after reports that the majority of recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union are not Jewish.

Brunner Buried: Report

JERUSALEM — The body of a key Nazi war criminal is buried in a Muslim cemetery in Damascus, according to the Jerusalem Post, which cited a European radio correspondent who spoke with Syrian officials. Nazi-hunters claimed for years that Alois Brunner was hiding in Syria, though Syria denied sheltering him. Brunner was private secretary to Adolf Eichmann, chief architect of the Holocaust, who was tried and executed in Israel in 1961.

WORLD

Shoah Memorial

MOSTAR, Bosnia — Local dignitaries and religious leaders attended a ceremony in this Bosnian town to dedicate a Holocaust memorial in the Jewish cemetery. The monument bears the names of 138 Mostar Jews killed in the Shoah.

Chanukah In Shanghai

SHANGHAI — This city's synagogue celebrated Chanukah for the first time in 47 years. Jewish leaders, diplomats and their families participated in the celebration at the Ohel Rachel Synagogue, which was restored in recent years after having been used as a warehouse.

Swiss To Apologize

ZURICH — Switzerland is planning to apologize for its anti-Jewish refugee policy during World War II, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported last week. The apology is expected to be issued by President Ruth Dreifuss, who is Jewish, after a panel of historians releases a report on the nation's wartime refugee policy.

Shul Firebombed

RENO, Nev. — The FBI is investigating the attempted firebombing of a Reno synagogue as a possible hate crime. A Molotov cocktail was thrown at the window of Temple Emanu El last week, but caused little damage. It is reportedly the third incident at the synagogue this year.

Pokémon Swastika

NEW YORK — Nintendo of America, makers of the popular Pokémon cards, said it will discontinue a card with an illustration of a swastika after receiving complaints from Jewish families. One of the Japanese-language cards, not meant for sale in the U.S., depicts a red manji, or swastika. In Japan, where the symbol predates the Nazis by centuries, it means good fortune and can also represent a Buddhist temple.

Bodies of 1973 War Dead Returned To Israel

JERUSALEM — The bodies of two Israeli soldiers missing since the 1973 Yom Kippur War have been found in the Sinai Desert in Egypt.

At a news conference last week, the head of an Israeli army search team that had been working in Egypt announced that the bodies of Cpl. Leon Cohen and Cpl. Nadiv Mordechai had been found Nov. 12 near the site of where their tank was hit on Oct. 7, 1973, the second day of the war.

Previous efforts to locate the bodies immediately after the war and in subsequent years failed.

Photographs taken shortly after the battle revealed two mounds of earth near the tank. In later photographs, the mounds were covered by piles of earth from an Egyptian tractor digging defence trenches.

But re-examination of aerial photographs taken of the area shortly after the tank was hit and careful scouring of the zone by Israeli and Egyptian teams led to the bodies.

The remains were sent to Israel, where forensic specialists conducted DNA testing to confirm the identities before informing the two families.

Community groups get together to shine light on youth violence

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two groundbreaking meetings of minds last week brought together representatives of Jewish communal agencies, school officials and police to explore youth ennui and violence in the wake of the beating death of Matti Baranovsky.

A task force on youth violence, announced by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region chair Keith Landy at the Dec. 5 Chanukah memorial to Baranovsky, took shape following two meetings last Tuesday at the Lipa Green Building.

Perry Romberg of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is co-ordinating front-line service providers in the Jewish community to take a hard look at what agencies, both Jewish and not, can do to stem youth violence before it begins.

Officials from Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), the Jewish Russian Community Centre, and the Board of Jewish Education assembled under Romberg's direction for a preliminary discussion of current services for Toronto's 35,000-strong Russian-Jewish community, and what is needed in their neighbourhood in the future.

'A very serious discussion'

Later that evening, Bernie Farber, executive director of CJC's Ontario Region, and Ellen Cole, who chairs the region's community relations committee, convened a meeting of community agencies, in addition to representatives from the Toronto District School Board, several police officers from 32 Division, which is handling the Baranovsky case, and Judith Kennedy, principal of Northview Heights Secondary School, where Matti had been a student.

Although violence is not a traditional hallmark of the Jewish community, the meeting was called to address the perception that violence among Jewish youth – especially among immigrants – is increasing, Farber told The CJN.

It was, Farber said, "a very serious discussion."

While Matti's death was obviously a violent act, the Bathurst Street corridor between Finch and Steeles Avenues, home to a large Russian-Jewish population, is not high crime area, Farber noted.

The one-time meeting allowed those present to "basically just brainstorm," said Cole. "It was very productive, and a lot of good ideas were raised."

Among them were how to engage disaffected youth. Possible solutions discussed are afterschool programs, putting social workers in parks where teenagers hang out, and persuading local businesses to hire students after classes.

The meeting also "tried to assuage fears that there is an epidemic of violence in the Jewish community," said Cole. Matti's death "was like an eruption. It brought the issue to the fore."

Touring in Jerusalem

As I wrote in this column last week, I recently returned from a short, intense, six day visit to Israel courtesy of the Ministry of Tourism and El Al Airlines.

I was a tourist in the fullest sense of the word, exhausted and exhilarated at the end of each day, musing to find the mot juste for my notebook and marvelling with the memories of the places I had been.

Three of my six days were devoted to Jerusalem.

Even though I have been to Jerusalem a number of times, feel familiar and quite at home in Jerusalem and have read a great deal about Jerusalem, the anticipation of imminently being there, prevented any meaningful distraction during the long but smooth plane ride there.

Among the material I read on the flight was a copy of a lecture by Elie Wiesel titled Jerusalem: Israel's Link with the Diaspora that he delivered in 1997 at the Martin (Szusz) Department of Land of Israel Studies at Bar-Ilan University.

The central question Wiesel posed in the address was "How is one to explain the attachment that Jews throughout the centuries have felt for Jerusalem?"

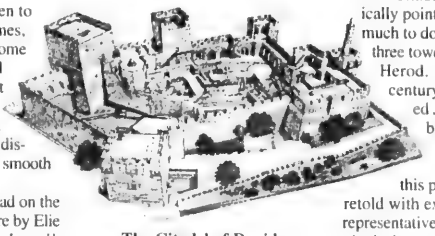
"Jerusalem ir hakodesh does not mean a holy city but a city of holiness. The nuance is important. In this city, more than anywhere else, man aspires to sacredness.

"Why should a Diaspora Jew dream of Jerusalem's secret wonders with love?" Wiesel asked.

"Is it because Jerusalem is said to be the heart of Jewish history, the centre of its spirituality? It is impossible to replace Jerusalem – or to ignore it... What would Jewish prayer be without Jerusalem?... Anchored in Jewish memory, it endows Jewish history with its one dimension of immortality. It is there that the distant past attains its climactic fusion with the redemptive future."

These words "[where] the distant past attains its climactic fusion with the redemptive future" were to be the emotional and spiritual jet propulsion for the mini whirlwind tour that was to unfold in the next few days.

After I unpacked my bags and settled into my room at the Hyatt Regency Hotel on Mount Scopus, my guide, Ruth Eisenstein and I, set out for the Tower of David in the Old City to visit the Citadel Museum.



The Citadel of David.

To get there, we drove via Har Hazeitim, the Mount of Olives. The panorama westward was breathtaking beyond words.

As it was near noon, the sun was very high in the bright blue sky. The quality of the light illuminated the horizon as if it were a finely-detailed backdrop to a movie set.

We stopped by a high ridge for a few moments to enable me to snap a couple of photographs and simply, to stare at the view which was so remarkably different than the view at which I stared barely 24 hours earlier from the living room of my suburban Toronto home.

"The distant past" seemed at that moment to be so fully present.

We were met at the Tower of David Museum by Caroline Shapiro, the director of public relations and by Adi Levitan, our 23-year-old, Debra Winger-look-alike instructor.

"This is a live museum," Levitan emphasized. "Every stone is alive." This was her recurring theme throughout the 90 minutes that she guided us through the museum.

I quickly understood what she meant. The theme applied to every historical and archeological site in Israel where the museums themselves were the very locations written about in the pages of our sacred texts and history books.

The Citadel itself, Levitan ironically pointed out, had really not much to do with King David. Its three towers were built by King Herod. Since the second century BCE, it has protected Jerusalem from possible northern incursions.

The more than 3,000 year history of this place – the citadel – is retold with exhaustive attention to representative detail, uncanny technical innovation and obvious concern toward the patience and understanding of the tourist.

Typical of all Herodian structures, it is a magnificent architectural achievement, combining aesthetics with pragmatics. It dominates the Old City from the city's highest point.

One walks on its ramparts high above the traffic on the street, seeing in every direction a visual resonance from our "distant past" and hearing in our hearts the echo of our ancient rabbis whispered delight: "Whoever did not see Jerusalem in all her glory never saw a beautiful city."

I left the citadel with goosebumps. And this was only the first hour of the first day of my short visit. MBD

CHAT dedicates expanded campus

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Well, we did it!" exclaimed CHAT president Baila Lubek at the dedication luncheon for the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre, the expanded facility of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

"How far we have come since May 28!" she said, referring to the day of the groundbreaking, as well as to the renovation of the existing school. The new centre has doubled the size of the building, with 21 new classrooms, a library, a computer centre, an athletic wing and a central atrium.

Lubeck praised the efforts of staff and volunteers, as well as the generosity of donors to the project. She also noted the partnership of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Toronto District school Board in the project.

Before the luncheon program, headmaster Paul Shaviv, "in the presence of Anne Tanenbaum," [the major donor], affixed the ornamental mezuzah, which was crafted by former student Brenda Gasner Lass.

The participants then made their way to the donor board, where former headmaster Rabbi Marvin Pachino and Tanenbaum cut the ribbon to dedicate it.

Lubek noted that Tanenbaum had returned from Florida especially to take part in the dedication.

Alan Sandler, president of UJA Federation, said the new facility was a tribute to the "vision, unity and maturity of the Jewish community of Toronto," as well as a sign of the commitment of UJA Federation to Jewish education.

Shaviv said the dedication "is not the celebration of a completion – it is the celebration of a beginning. It marks a going forward, a wonderful and significant beginning."

Vice-principal of general studies Sheldon Friedman, announced the inauguration of the annual CHAT Award for Volunteerism. It is being named the Howie Meyer Award for Excellence in Volunteerism in honour of the first recipient, Howie Meyer, who was co-chair of the building committee.

Toronto councillor Mike Feldman presented a plaque to Brian Lass, chairman of the board of CHAT, on behalf of Mayor Mel Lastman and Toronto City Council.

Plaques of appreciation were also presented to management team member Terry Cyr, to Lubek, and in absentia to Mel Finkelstein, an active member of the lay leadership.

CHAT students Adina Herbert, accompanied by guitarist Jordan Saperia, and Orli Cohen gave musical presentations, which were enthusiastically received by the luncheon participants.

Hamotzi was said by Arthur Tanenbaum, former executive director of Associated Hebrew Schools, and benching was led by Seymour Epstein, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education.

In the afternoon, about 300 people came for an open house and a tour of the school.

Reflecting on the dedication of the new campus, Shaviv called it "another wonderful occasion in a wonderful and important year for CHAT.

"It showed the strength of the school leadership, and the success of our partnership with UJA Federation, but most of all it was a purposeful beginning to the major tasks that still lie ahead of us."

Brian Lass, chair of CHAT board; Howard Meyer, and Sheldon Friedman, general studies principal.

Israel aims to balance religious interests: Ben-Ami

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel is allowing a mosque to be built near a basilica in Nazareth so as "to strike a balance" between competing religious interests, says Shlomo Ben-Ami, Israel's minister of public security.

Denying a recent Vatican assertion that Israel's decision has sown Muslim-Christian discord, Ben-Ami said Israel has done everything in its power to calm the situation.

In an interview, he levelled two bold accusations.

He blamed Palestine Authority president Yasser Arafat, as well as Saudi Arabia, for fomenting the tension. Without elaborating, he said that they were following a narrow "political agenda."

Ben-Ami also claimed that the Vatican had gone through "the motions" by responding to Arafat's appeal to Israeli Arabs not to build a mosque next to the Basilica of the Annunciation.

The simmering controversy began about two years ago when Israeli Muslims, spearheaded by the Islamic Movement, protested a decision by the municipality of Nazareth – Jesus' boyhood hometown – to clear a plaza near the basilica for Christian millennium pilgrims.

Arguing that the land belonged to the Wakf, an Islamic religious trust, Muslims erected a tent on the site. Last Easter, violence boiled over, prompting the former Israeli government, led by Benjamin Netanyahu, to impose a compromise.

Under the plan, which was finalized by the current Israeli government headed by Ehud Barak, Muslims were permitted to build a small mosque, leaving sufficient room for a plaza.

Ben-Ami, who heads a ministerial committee responsible for implementing the compromise, said that Israel had been duty-bound to find "a difficult equilibrium" in Nazareth, where Muslims outnumber Christians by a significant margin (42,000 to 18,000).

Here in Toronto at the invitation of the Sephardi Kehila Centre and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ben-Ami pointed out that the distance between the basilica and the mosque will be 300 yards.

And, he added, construction of the mosque will not start unless Muslims "behave in an orderly way," and certainly long after Pope John Paul II's scheduled visit to Israel in March 2000.

Shlomo Ben-Ami

In an implicit rebuke to the Vatican, Ben-Ami said the compromise solution has enabled Israel to restore order at the site. The "ugly tent" which had limited freedom of movement was removed, and a police station was built to ensure that Muslims do not harass Christians.

Ben-Ami, a former history professor and Israel's first ambassador to Spain (1987-91), dismissed an accusation by the mayor of Jerusalem, Ehud Olmert, that the compromise was "wrong, a mistake, and not too smart."

Turning to another topic, Ben-Ami declared that social and political means, rather than police methods, are the most effective way to combat the Islamic Movement in Israel. Last September, three of its members were killed when they attempted to blow up several Israeli commuter buses.

"The best way to undermine it is to [offer] services that the Islamic Movement provides to the people. When you have a vacuum, others fill it. The needs of Israeli Arabs have been neglected for years," he said, referring to municipal, educational and social welfare budgets.

The late Yitzhak Rabin, he explained, launched a massive initiative of public investment in the Israeli Arab sector.

Israel's obligation is to perpetuate Rabin's legacy by providing "decent conditions for their development." This policy, he said, was abandoned after Rabin's assassination.

Ben-Ami disclosed that Israel intends to allocate equitable funds to Arab municipalities. But this process will not begin until 2000. Israel inherited a deficit from the previous government, and overall economic recovery must take precedence over the needs of Israeli Arab citizens, he said.

Conceding that some of their grievances are justified, Ben-Ami said he personally believes that Barak should have appointed an Arab to the cabinet. "This may happen in the not far distant future," he said, suggesting that the prime minister will address this issue once the peace process is well in hand.

Commenting on the current dispute which has delayed a five percent Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, Ben-Ami said Israel has a unilateral right under the Sharm-el Sheik memorandum to decide what lands to relinquish to the Palestinians.

Looking farther ahead, he said it is in Israel's interest to sign a final status agreement with the Palestinians by September 2000, Barak's self-imposed deadline.

"We will do our very best for it to happen," he said. However, Ben-Ami was not certain whether the deadline would be met.

He declined to say whether Barak favors a Palestinian state as part of a permanent status accord. But he said such an entity should be demilitarized and barred from entering into military alliances with third countries, and Israel should maintain control of the Jordan Valley.

The border issue, which encompasses Jewish settlements in the territories, will be the toughest nut to crack, he acknowledged.

He said he opposes the unofficial 1995 Beilin-Abu Mazin scheme, which envisages a 90 percent Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank.

Ben-Ami refused to be drawn into a discussion of how much of the West Bank Israel should ultimately give up. But he said, "The question is one of trade-offs. We'll do our best to accommodate the legitimate Palestinian demands, and I hope they'll reciprocate."

The safe passage accord, signed recently, is working out so well that he is considering the removal of Border Police units from the area. "I'm not sure they have much work to do," he said, observing that not a single Palestinian has been arrested on security charges so far.

He expects the second safe passage route to be operational in February, provided Israel and the Palestinians can agree on the location of the exit.

St. Catharines man is facing deportation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An 89-year-old St. Catharines man is facing possible loss of citizenship and deportation for allegedly concealing his wartime activities on applying to immigrate here in 1947.

Jacob Fast, a Ukrainian-born retired mechanic, father and grandfather who became a Canadian citizen in 1954, was served on Oct. 1 with a notice of intention to revoke his citizenship.

A motion relating to the action in the Federal Court of Canada, scheduled for last Thursday in Ottawa, was adjourned. A new date has not yet been set.

The government has alleged: that Fast failed to divulge that he was "a German citizen and therefore an enemy alien and inadmissible to Canada;" "collaboration with German occupation authorities in Ukraine;" and "association with the German Security Police and Security Service (Sicherheitspolizei und SD)."

The SD (Sicherheitsdienst des Reichsführers-SS) was the Nazi party's intelligence service, according to the Encyclopedia of the Holocaust.

"This is not a war criminal case," said Fast's lawyer, Peter Doody. "There is no allegation that he committed any crime at any time."

"I don't gainsay the horrific nature of what went on [in the Holocaust] at all, [but] when the government doesn't even say he committed a crime, is this a just thing? I don't think so," Doody said.

Fast is denying all allegations.

His case marks the 16th in a series of revocation of citizenship and deportation proceedings initiated by the Canadian government, said Paul Vickery, director of the War Crimes section of the Department of Justice.

Similar trials are usually completed within about a year of the beginning of the process, he noted.

"We're glad to see things are moving in the right direction," said Moshe Ronen, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "Canada on the international stage has been playing the moral conscience of the world."

Ronen believes the federal government is "doing a good job" in Fast's case.

For Ronen, Fast's advanced age is not an issue. "Our position is that we should not reward longevity."

Lobby menorah ban vexes condo owner

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A downtown Toronto condominium owner says he was discriminated against by being refused the right to erect a menorah alongside a Christmas tree in his building's lobby.

"I just find this whole thing appalling," said an exasperated Gary Raich, who lives in the Market Square condo complex.

Raich, who's lived at 80 Front St. E.for eight years, said he was told by the building's property manager in a letter a year ago that yuletide decorations in the lobby "are secular in nature and do not reflect the beliefs of any particular religion or culture."

The property manager said he doesn't "see the need or feel it would be appropriate to introduce specific symbols of a particular religion."

When Raich raised the issue again this year, the president of the condo board wrote him saying that because the building's residents adhere to many faiths, and some to none, "it would be inappropriate to have any religious symbols in our common area.

"We decided that it would be acceptable to use a Christmas tree again because we do not regard it as a Christian symbol but as a seasonal emblem," wrote board president Alberto Menendez.

Raich told The CJN that went against a unanimous show-of-hands vote at the board's annual meeting in favor of having a menorah in the lobby.

He said he was pleasantly surprised by the response of board members, except for one who told him privately that the presence of a menorah would cause ill feelings towards Jews.

But by not allowing a menorah alongside the usual Christmas tree, "they've shown a complete lack of respect," Raich said, adding he's been backed up by several other Jewish residents in the 182-unit building.

Raich has taken his complaint to B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, where spokesperson Amelia Golden said a Christmas tree is a symbol of Christmas, which is a Christian holiday.

"There should be an inclusive policy for all religions, and [the condo board] should include chanukiyot."

Golden said the condo board will meet Dec. 22, when its policy will be given further consideration. But, she said, that's too late for Chanukah this year.

They happen also to be Canadian

As of this writing, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien has not yet tabled the Quebec referendum review legislation. Even so, its purported contents have been much discussed in the media. According to those reports, the bill will focus on three key areas in the next referendum process: the nature of the question, the nature of the vote and the nature of the negotiations with Quebec should a clear question yield a clear majority in favour of separation.

In moving forward with the review legislation, the prime minister is taking the next step in this critically important debate following the Supreme Court referendum reference some 16 months ago.

It is a logical step and we commend him for taking it.

In its ruling, the Supreme Court provided the legal framework within which Canada would be compelled to negotiate the dismantling of the country. The court was explicit, if not detailed. "A clear majority vote in Quebec on a clear question in favour of secession would confer democratic legitimacy on the secession initiative which all of the other participants in Confederation would have to recognize…[with] principaled negotiations."

The prime minister's initiative attempts to incorporate the Supreme Court wisdom into the referendum process.

In accordance with the court's ruling, that process will have three stages: the question, the vote, and the resulting negotiations, if any, between Canada and Quebec.

The National Assembly of Quebec determines the referendum question, but Parliament – that is, Canadians, too – will be able to assess its clarity. The people of Quebec will vote upon the question, but Parliament – that is, Canadians, too – will be able to assess the clarity of the result.

Not to include Parliament in the referendum process in this manner, would not only offend the Supreme Court's ruling, it would also offend the rules of elementary fairness and morality.

Federalist critics of the prime minister's initiative have taken issue with the timing of the proposal, not with its substance. They argue that the risk of rekindling smoldering separatist passions by tabling the bill outweighs any potential benefits that may result. But this criticism collapses in the face of the critics' gaping inability to pinpoint a better time to launch the initiative.

In his condemnation of the prime minister, Bloc Québécois member Daniel Turp relied on a legal opinion by Université de Montréal law professor André Lajoie, who maintained, according to the Globe and Mail, that "the meaning and the clarity of the question depends upon those to whom the question is asked: Quebecers."

Lajoie's attitude misses half the point, namely, that Quebecers, at the time they will be voting, will happen also to be Canadians. Moreover, and more importantly, the majority of those Quebecers have consistently voted that they want to remain Canadians.

Parliament owes a duty of representation to them as well as to the rest of the country in the referendum process.

Thankfully, the prime minister understands this.

Free High Holy Day seats

Jonathan Woocher, the executive vice-president of the Jewish Educational Service of North America, recently criticized high prices for High Holy Day seats and other Jewish services. In this regard, it is interesting to note how one community, Greater Miami, sought to make such services affordable and thereby bring equity to the process.

Bruce Yudewitz, director of Community Planning and Allocations for the Greater Miami Jewish Federation, has detailed how, for the first time this year, the Greater Miami Jewish Federation offered a community-wide program making free High Holy Day seats available to people in the community, and 2,700 people attended.

This may well be a program which the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, on examination, should consider emulating.

Attacks CJN policies

I have been reading your paper for about 15 years now. I am 36. I was born non-fully-observant yet traditional.

Your paper tries to truly reflect the community without understanding several points: The real assimilated Jews don't read The CJN, so stop trying to target them; with a current crisis of 50 percent assimilation and intermarriage, you have an obligation to positively influence Jews as much as possible to act and think more Jewishly; many Jews today have a spiritual thirst not being met.

Instead, you are busy promoting the Western values of secularism and pluralism. Holidays aside, you give a disproportionate amount of coverage to whatever voices want to be heard without enough coverage of traditional Judaism. I understand that your editorial board and board of directors are made up of high-powered liberal and "progressive" thinking people. That's exactly how your newspaper comes across.

Interviews with celebrities don't even discuss Jewish issues and perspectives. There are never critiques about any wayward organization except for Jews for J. Is there anything you stand for Jewishly? Is it any wonder that we are losing so many Jews?

Settlements endanger peace

It is most unfortunate that The CJN has chosen to highlight the removal of illegal settlers from 12 "outposts," without placing this action into perspective ("IDF removes settlers," Nov. 18).

There were 42 settlements established during the final year of Benjamin Netanyahu's government, all of which were created by the so-called "settlers' movement" and all of which were and are an affront to peace efforts. They create a significant drain on Israel's economy while not adding any real security to the country in light of modern warfare.

Ehud Barak's two-faced solution was to do a deal that left 30 still in place. This will not help to bring peace, nor will permitting any further colonization of the territories by people who insist on a "greater Israel" and war, after war, after war.

Mistrusts 'new historians'

I was shocked and disgusted by Morton Weinfeld's "What is truth?" (CJN, Nov. 25). The so-called "new historian" school of anti-Zionist historians is credited, if we use their "history" properly, with giving us the opportunity to strengthen the moral case for Zionism, according to Weinfeld. Either Weinfeld has been misled, or he is trying to mislead those readers who are not familiar with this subject.

Benny Morris's accounts (chief among the "new historians") have been seriously challenged by Shabtai Teveth, David Ben-Gurion's chief biographer, Robert Satloff (Washington Institute For Near East Studies) and Professor Ephraim Karsh in Fabricating Israeli History — The New Historian. I recommend this book to all those who want to learn about this subject.

Readers of The CJN should know that the purpose of these anti-Zionist "new historians" is to portray Zionism as the "original sin" underlying the region's violent history. Respected Israeli author Aharon Megged wrote in Ha'aretz in 1994, in an article entitled "The Israeli Suicide Drive:" "It would be erroneous to call this 'myth debunking.' The work done before our eyes is merely the rewriting of the 100-year Zionist history in the spirit of its enemies and opponents."

Recognize Israel's rescue help

I note with interest the comment by the president of the American Red Cross that the exclusion of Israel's Magen David Adom is a betrayal of the sacred principles of the Red Cross movement and should not be tolerated any longer.

A number of years ago, I wrote to the former executive director of the Canadian Red Cross complaining about Israel's exclusion and in a rather matter of a fact way, he responded that Israel was content to have observer status. I found this unsatisfactory and wrote to the Canadian president of Magen David Adom and was rather taken aback that there was little enthusiasm for my continuing my protest.

Arab countries have for years been able to fly the crescent and it seems ridiculous to me that Israel's humanitarian involvement would be excluded from the International Committee of the Red Cross given the visibility of Israeli rescue teams almost anywhere in the world where a tragedy occurs.

If soldiers wearing the Star of David are acceptable in Turkey to aid earthquake victims, then that should be good enough for the acceptance of Magen David Adom by every other country that is a member of the Red Cross.

Perspectives

A page of Saskatchewan Jewish history

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

It all started as a mystery. We were driving along Highway 18 in southeastern Saskatchewan when we noticed a sign on the side of the road: Hirsch. A small village, a few houses. "Strange name for a Sakatchewan farming community," I thought. All around us, phosphorescent yellow canola fields as far as one could see, ahead the highway, straight as an arrow, and above all, the enormous prairie skies.

Unexpectedly, on our left, there was a tall gate with a big sign above it: "Hirsch Community Jewish Cemetery," topped by a large Magen David. In front of the gate stood a burnished bronze commemorative plaque; beyond the wire fence of the cemetery, tombstones – some newer ones, some crumbling under the weight of the passing years – shared a vast expanse of dry grass with rows of young trees rustling in the gentle prairie wind. Another mystery: a Jewish cemetery on a deserted Saskatchewan road in the middle of nowhere?

Time stood still and we stepped into history. The bronze plaque read as follows:

Hirsch Colony 1892-1942. Erected in commemoration of the Baron de Hirsch Jewish agricultural colony. Jewish immigrants who mostly came from Czarist Russia, Romania, Austria and Poland were assisted by the Baron de Hirsch Institute and the Jewish Colonization Association. These colonists were motivated by a keen desire to escape religious persecution and racial discrimination, with the rights to own and farm their land and freely adhere to their orthodox faith. Erected by former colonists and descendants in co-operation with Saskatchewan Department of Tourism and Renewable Resources.

Reverently, we opened the cemetery gate and stepped inside. Simple tombstones attested to the passing of these Jews who came from all over eastern Europe in search of a life free of persecution and who found it far away from their native villages and shtetls, in a cold and unforgiving land. Some tombstones only told a name and a date: Judah Blank, died December 16, 1904; Himie Barnblat, died April 4, 1908. Other ones mentioned the age as well: Israel Berner, age 20 years; Nathan Muscovici, age 17. Untold stories of hardship and of hopes. We found out about all this and much more when, a few hours later, we met the indomitable Gertie Lev who almost singlehandedly had saved the Hirsch Community Jewish Cemetery from disrepair and oblivion.

Over coffee and cookies in Gertie's hospitable living room filled with family pictures and Jewish memorabilia, we plunged ourselves into the intertwined histories of the Hirsch Community Jewish Cemetery and Gertie's busy life as the only Jew in Estevan, a lively southern Saskatchewan town. As we pored over her well-documented scrapbook, chock-full of old papers, articles and yellowed photographs, the story of the Hirsch settlement came to life and we discovered a slice of Canadian Jewish history.

The imposing entrance gate to the Hirsch Community Jewish Cemetery.

Why would eastern European Jews come to settle in far-away Saskatchewan – then known as the Northwestern Territories – more than 100 years ago? In 1881, Russian Czar Alexander II was assassinated by revolutionaries who made the Jews their scapegoats; the "May Laws" of 1882 expelled the Jewish population from villages and prohibited Jews from renting or buying land for agricultural purposes. A series of pogroms followed, prompting a large scale emigration. In 1884, an immigration handbook in Yiddish found its way in eastern Europe encouraging settlement in Western Canada, where the Canadian Pacific Railway was opening vast agricultural lands. John A. MacDonald, the Prime Minister of Canada, was persuaded by Sir Alexander Tilloch Galt, one of Canada's Fathers of Confederation, to accept a number of eastern European Jewish refugees, offering them land and the freedom to practise their religion.

Mrs. Gertie Lev shows her scrapbook.

Between 1886 and 1906, six farming communities were established in Saskatchewan. The first one, dubbed by the local population "The New Jerusalem," did not survive after six years of inadequate winter shelter, heavy snowfalls, and drought. Other colonies were more successful; among them was Walpella, of early Bronfman fame: Ekiel and Mindel Bronfman arrived there as colonists, but shortly afterwards they moved east, eventually founding the Bronfman dynasty, well known for Jewish communal leadership and, of course, Seagram whiskey.

Another successful colony, Edenbridge, was established by Lithuanian Jews who had previously settled in South Africa. Although this colony does not exist anymore, most of the members of the founding families still live in the area and the colonists' synagogue – Beth Israel, built in 1908 and an active place of worship until 1964 – was subsequently declared a Saskatchewan historic site. And this brings us to the Hirsch colony and to its namesake, Baron Maurice de Hirsch.

Baron de Hirsch, a rich financier and philanthropist, regarded the creation of a Jewish state as a fantasy. He believed that the violent outbreaks against eastern European Jews were due to the fact that they were different from others and, therefore, they should strive to become more like their neighbours. Consequently, he established the Jewish Colonization Association, with the purpose of helping Jews become farmers in North and South America. Because he favoured Argentina as a preferred colonization site, the village of Hirsch remained the only Canadian farming community supported and funded by Baron de Hirsch's charity.

The first wave of colonists arrived in 1892 via Montreal, where some of them had been residing from one to five years. According to Mrs. Levi's records, this group also included "30 daughters and 43 sons." More colonists joined them, refugees from Russia, Poland, Romania, Austria. Although some of them eventually left to work as tailors, shopkeepers or peddlers, most of the settlers persevered in their backbreaking labour and tried to cope with poor crops, difficult living conditions, and loneliness.

The tombstones stand witness to years of struggle, perserverance and hope.

They continued to receive material and technical support from the Jewish Colonization Association and soon the community grew to include a school, a hotel, a synagogue. Also during the first year of the settlement, one of the colonists, Mr. Blank, donated an acre of his farm for the Hirsch Jewish Cemetery where, over the years, about 150 Jews from Hirsch were laid to rest.

About 100 descendants of the colonists from the Jewish farm community of Hirsch, as well as family and friends, gathered 88 years later to attend the consecration and designation of the Jewish Cemetery as a historic site. They came from Toronto, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Montreal, Estevan, and Hirsch. After the dedication ceremony, all the participants drove to Estevan where Gertie Lev and her husband Morris, the only Jewish couple left in town, hosted a reception.

At the time, Morris and his brother Gordon were still working on their farm in Hirsch where a number of families had managed to survive and prosper, despite the initial lack of farming experience and lean years of drought and crop failures.

When Gertie married Morris and moved to Estevan, just 18 km west of Hirsch, her family worried how a "city girl" like her would cope with being a farmer's wife. Not Gertie. She took her life in stride and got involved. One of her first endeavours when she arrived in Estevan 27 years ago was the restoration of the Hirsch Community Jewish Cemetery, which was in a terrible state of neglect at the time

Gertie reminisces: "How can Jewish people let a Jewish cemetery go to such disrepair? I went to the boys [the Kleiman brothers, fourth generation farmers in Hirsch] and I said 'My God, how can you, being Jewish, not see to it that this was taken care of?' So I went to the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society [in Winnipeg] and I told them how disappointed I was that the cemetery was not being taken care of … I feel that it's a stigma against my being Jewish that they've got a Jewish cemetery that's so terribly looked after."

And look after it she did. As a designated historic site, the cemetery is now a reminder of an important period in the history of the Jewish people and of Saskatchewan. For the descendants of the original colonists, it serves as a focal point, a concrete way to stay in touch with their cultural and historical roots.

Years later, Gertie lost her husband Morris, her brother-in-law Gordon and his wife Irma. To fulfil their last wish, she arranged to have trees planted in the cemetery and had a plaque made in their honour. Displayed at the cemetery entrance, the plaque reminds visitors of the Lev family "who pioneered and farmed in the Hirsch Area since 1928."

We told Gertie how impressed we were with the cemetery, the memorial plaques and the young trees growing among the weathered old tombstones. Surrounded by her memories and the warmth and friendship of her community, she answered: "I am a Jewish ambassador without portfolio."

We had arrived in Estevan with an unsolved mystery; we were leaving with our mystery solved and had acquired a wealth of knowledge and a new and gracious friend.

The movie Cattle-Jew Levi

On the last day of my recent visit to Munich, I scanned the advertisements of the movie theatres. One title immediately caught my eye: Viehjud Levi (Cattle-Jew Levi is as close as one can come to rendering it in English). But what the translation does not convey is the fact that a trader in cattle – an occupation almost entirely peopled by Jews – was generally demeaned.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I myself had cattle dealers in my ancestry, and I remember the embarrassed discussions that took place concerning them.

So, naturally, I was intrigued by the title and also by the reviews, which were generally highly favourable.

The plot was simple – Levi, a Jewish cattle-dealer, was attracted to the daughter of the owner of the village inn and his sentiments were reciprocated. Their relationship was judged with indifference by some of the farmers and with antagonism by the growing group of Nazis whose influence was on the increase. Cattle-Jew Levi is set at the same time as the musical Cabaret, just before Hitler's assumption of power.

The film portrays the Jews in highly favourable tones: Levi is honest, of good cheer, modest and courteous. The Nazis do not like the attention he gives to the innkeeper's daughter; they boycott her father and harass the Jew. When he is made fun of and is physically attacked, he decides that there is no future for him in this environment. He drives away, and the fading rear lights of his automobile end the movie.

There is no question that he evoked sympathy in the audience, but at the cost of certain inconsistencies.

While Levi proclaims at one point that his family has lived in Germany for more than three generations, he is attired not like an ordinary country merchant, but in Jewish "uniform" – black yeshiva dress, yeshiva hat and the absence of a tie. But in no respect does he display any traditional observance: The moment he comes into the room he takes off his hat and eats and drinks in the inn along with all the others.

Regrettably, Levi appears as a single individual unconnected to any Jewish community that, in its own way, would not have tolerated his liaison with a gentile girl. Jews in Germany's farm country were highly traditional.

My dad – whose family resided in the country for hundreds of years – came from a little village with a few Jewish families, all of whom were poor, but so connected to their Jewish heritage that they would not send their children to public school. They saved enough money to give them what we would call a day school education. But they dressed like everyone else and none of them wore a Levi-like uniform.

These reservations aside, the movie was well constructed and quietly successful in arousing sympathy for the chief character. For at least two or three minutes after the film ended, the audience sat quietly – no doubt everyone was aware that this kind of anti-Jewish animosity had dreadful results. After all, Munich was the city where it all started.

A path for the righteous

I have watched a lot of Christmas specials in my lifetime. Each December the average couch potato is assaulted with merry mayhem in TV-land. The shows end with singing of carols and a message of peace on earth and goodwill towards men. I'm always left feeling hollow.

What does goodwill towards men mean? Does it entail not pulling your sister's braids? Not shooing away the neighbour's cat with a rake?

Why is peace on earth only demanded during a few select weeks?

I'm left wondering if we even understand the concept. Would we recognize goodwill in someone? Would I?

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

A few weeks ago I was honoured to meet someone who embodied goodwill towards her fellow man.

Mrs. Cora Greenaway grew up in Holland. She was 18 when England declared war on Germany. Six months later in 1940, her country was invaded and a German civilian government was established.

Mrs. Greenaway, née de Jong, isn't Jewish. She says that at first the new government left her family and other Christians alone because they were "such good Aryans." Mrs. Greenaway didn't agree with that sentiment.

She saw the Germans take away the possessions of her Jewish friends, take away their rights and finally take them away.

"What's up? They're gone," she recalls. By 1942, she describes the situation "like a noose; getting tighter and tighter."

Mrs. Greenaway, who's a much-honoured member of the art community in Nova Scotia, remembers how it was before the occupation, before the loss of so many lives.

She recalls the best cabaret in Holland was owned by Jews. She also remembers a time when people weren't classified by religion. "Before the war you never thought this person was Jewish."

During the war, Mrs. Greenaway became a messenger of sorts.

She was part of a group that helped Jews escape or hide. She relayed messages, she got extra ration cards which eventually would feed a family in hiding. She was only 20. A year younger than I am right now.

This was not her only mitzvah. There was a couple in Amsterdam with a baby, a baby who wouldn't have survived the war without her help.

Mrs. Greenaway went to Amsterdam to take the child to someone who would pass it along, like a relay baton, until it was safe.

She recalls the mother wanting her to stay, while she wanted to leave before curfew. "Her one and only child, but I'm taking it away."

She eventually met her contact person who informed her "you're late." She replied, "So would you be if you had to do what I had to do."

Telling her story, she clenches her hands and makes guttural sounds where words seem to fail to express her rage, her sadness, and her memories.

"You had to do something, you couldn't sit down and do nothing."

After the war, she saw people come back to their homes and find nothing. She saw people look for their families and fail.

She discovered that her friends, both Christians and Jews, had died in the camps or from fighting back.

"All my friends were gone."

Mrs. Greenaway is what we call a Righteous Gentile. At the Holocaust museum in Israel, Yad Vashem, there's a path for these people.

A tree and a name plaque mark their mitzvah. I don't know if there's one for Mrs. Greenaway, but there should be.

There's another honour I'd like to bestow on this woman, and all those like her. Every time I hear the phrase goodwill towards men, I will think of her.

My trip to Israel

Given that my job here is to be a student voice and given the time of year, I am certain you are preparing to read yet another column of complaints: Why do we live in the coldest city? Can you believe how much reading I have to do? And that 20-page paper just isn't getting written! Well, seeing as I was able to vent in the first 50 words of the column, I can now discuss a far more enlightening topic: my recent trip to Israel.

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

At the beginning of November, as chair of city-wide Hillel in Montreal, I was fortunate to have been one of three students among a total of 20 delegates, community leaders from across the country, to go on a fact-finding mission to Israel, where we attempted to gather first-hand information on the future of the Palestinian Authority and the settlements.

Before I left, I was extremely nervous – not because I knew we were travelling to Hebron, Beit El or any other potentially vulnerable areas, but because I didn't know what to expect. And being one of only three students, I was unsure what was expected of me. Also, I knew that once I was there, I wasn't going to want to come home – and I was right.

On this trip, I spent two days in a conference at Bar-Ilan University and the BESA Institute and then two days travelling to settlements in the West Bank. I met with politicians, community leaders and settlers, in the hope of understanding their true sentiments on the future of Israel and the creation of the Palestinian State.

Prior to my departure, I admit that I knew only the bare bones of what was going on in Israel and the details remained extremely shadowy. After four days of high intensity political discussions and briefings in Ma'arat Hamachpelah, Beit El, Ariel, Otniel and other places, I had more questions and far fewer answers.

I began to realize the true complexity of the situation and witness how influential personal emotions are in politics. The "tour guide" on our bulletproof and shatterproof bus that we used for travel into Hebron was in charge of PR for the Yesha Council (Hebrew acronym of Judah, Samaria and Gaza). The passion with which she spoke about her settlement and her right to live where she wanted, fascinated me. Her determination and willingness to fight for what she believed in showed me how tough you have to be to live in that country and to make sure you don't get bulldozed over (literally).

Despite all the uncertainties in my mind, I made one clear observation: Israelis have come to accept the notion of the creation of a Palestinian state far more readily than Jews in the Diaspora have.

The politics were proving overwhelming to me, and I was therefore extra excited that I would be spending Shabbat in Jerusalem.

On Nov. 14, I landed at Dorval at 6:15 am. When I got into the car, I told my mother, "I had the most unbelievable Shabbat ever!"

To describe the awe of my Shabbat would require at least 25 pages. I was swept off my feet by the ruach in the streets on Friday afternoon, by how calm everything was at the sounding of the Shabbat horn, by the women swaying to the tunes of kabbalat Shabbat in synagogue, and by the feeling of holiness around the Shabbat dinner table.

I have found myself immersed in deep conversations, each beginning with, "So, now that you've participated in the conference, what do you think is the future of the Palestinian Authority?" And I repeatedly found myself at a loss for an answer.

Since my return, I have tried to anticipate what was still expected of me. I eventually solidified two resolutions.

The first is that I can now implement student programs to educate others about what is actually going on in Israel and how Diaspora Jewry can help, because I have more material to counter unfounded claims about Israel made by students trying to provoke Jewish student organizations.

The second one does not stem from the organized portion of my trip but rather from my Shabbat experience. My goal is to try to make every Shabbat as amazing as the one I experienced in Jerusalem, even as I count the days until I can return.

But, for now, I have to suit up for the cold, read over 350 pages and write a 20-page paper – admittedly comparatively trivial concerns.

The Kirshner File

Sam Borenstein worked from the heart

As a young, aspiring reporter in Montreal in 1964, one of my first stories was about Sam Borenstein, the iconoclastic painter.

After the piece appeared in the Westward News, the now-defunct weekly owned and edited by a rambunctious Irishman named John O'Meara, Borenstein gratefully gave me a print of one of his seething expressionistic landscapes of the Quebec countryside.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Painted in Piedmont on Jan. 10, 1961, it is a typical Borenstein canvas, an explosion of vivid red, blue and white brushstrokes. It is a winter scene of bare trees, two simple cottages and a river partially coated in snow. Inexorably drawn to its simplicity and its robustness, I had it framed. Thirty-five years on, the print still hangs in my house, a constant reminder of an artist who marched to no one's rhythm but his own.

When I met Borenstein, a kindly and solicitous person who apparently could be mercurial, unpredictable and volatile, he was at the height of his creative powers, and had already succeeded in making something of an impression on Canada's artistic community.

Now, three decades on, his work can be found in major museums across Canada and in the United States – the Art Gallery of Ontario, the National Gallery in Ottawa, the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, the Musée du Québec, the Hamilton Museum of Fine Arts, and the Hirschhorn Museum in Washington, D.C.

But even 20 years ago, Borenstein was something of a force in the art world. Such was his reputation that, in 1978, William Kuhns and Leo Rosshandler published Sam Borenstein, a lavishly-illustrated coffee-table book in his honour.

Yet, 30 years after his untimely death, it is debatable whether he has received the recognition he deserves. As art dealer and friend Walter Klinkhoff has observed, Borenstein occupies "a small place in Canadian art history."

Best known for his Laurentian landscapes, flower studies and portraits, Borenstein did not attain the fame he sought, probably because his flamboyant and emotionally-charged style was at variance with the conservative and reserved tastes of Montreal collectors.

As Klinkhoff put it: "Evidently, Borenstein was out of step. Emotion was to be recollected in tranquility, reason was to prevail over passion …if an artist's production was to be accepted as Canadian in form and spirit. Borenstein's paintings … do not qualify under these terms. If anything, they are on a collision course with the idyllic renderings of landscapes developed in Canada, following the practice set and the lead given by the Group of Seven."

Influenced by van Gogh and Soutine

Influenced by van Gogh and Soutine, Borenstein was a painter of "wrenchingly strong colors and writhing shapes," as critic Lawrence Sabbath has noted. He worked from the heart and was totally dedicated to his craft, even when he could not make a living from it.

Borenstein barely scraped by, doing what he could to support his beloved wife Judith and their three children, Norman, Maxine and Joyce (a Montreal filmmaker whose sensitive documentary, The Colors of My Father: A Portrait of Sam Borenstein, won a Genie and was nominated for an Academy Award). He sold antiques. He drove a taxi. At one point, Judith was the breadwinner.

Judith & Sam Borenstein

Born in 1908 in Kalvaria, Lithuania, Borenstein was the son of a rabbinic scholar whose wife died of influenza in 1918, the year of the great plague. The family immigrated to Canada in 1921 by way of Danzig and Liverpool.

Dropping out of school, Borenstein toiled in a garment factory and learned to be a cutter. Not cut out for the shmatta business, he enrolled in art classes at the Monument National. Often, he spent his days sketching on Mount Royal or St. Helen's Island.

In 1938, he met Judith, who sustained him through years of rejection and disappointment. She was a lifelong admirer, being impressed by the honesty and spontaneity of his paintings.

They spent summers in an old school house in the Laurentians, and in winter, he could be seen with a palette painting street scenes of Montreal.

Klinkhoff, a fan, gave Borenstein his first solo exhibition in 1958, and a second one in 1961. Sir George Williams University (Concordia) mounted a Borenstein retrospective in 1966.

Borenstein had many years left when he succumbed to cancer. He died on Dec. 15, 1969, two days after being admitted to the Jewish General Hospital.

Thirty years later, he is fondly remembered by those who had the fortune to meet him. "He was a kind of magician," says Joyce Borenstein. "He could transform a country village into a painting blazing with color."

Need one say more?

The plundering of Jewish works of art

Of late, great works of art looted by the Nazis from Jews during World War II – mainly paintings, drawings and sculptures – have been turning up in droves. Among the most notable examples:

Last January, Claude Monet's Waterlilies 1904, said to be worth $9 million (US) and owned by the Parisian collector Paul Rosenberg, surfaced.

A month later, Austria's minister of education ordered the return of a cache of paintings, some by Dutch master Franz Hals, to their original owners, Alphonse and Louis Rothschild and their heirs.

In July, much to its embarrassment, the Israel Museum in Jerusalem discovered that one of its prized pieces, Camille Pissarro's Boulevard Montmartre, Spring 1897, was really the property of the late Max Silberberg of Breslau, Germany.

While the Nazis were busy planning and implementing the Holocaust, they plundered the finest collections – private and public – in Europe.

France, the world's centre of art during this period, bore the brunt of the thefts, and Jewish collectors were the chief victims.

Hector Feliciano, in The Lost Museum (HarperCollins), reveals the details of this burgeoning scandal, the consequences of which still resonate. Feliciano, an American journalist, spent seven years researching the topic. His efforts have paid off. This is a first-class account, focusing on five French-Jewish families, the Rothschilds, the Rosenbergs, the Bernheim-Jeunes, the David-Weills and the Schlosses.

The German occupying force in Paris, he writes, went to great lengths to organize the confiscations. Adolf Hitler and Hermann Goering, being avid collectors, instigated the process.

The scale of the plunder was vast. In France alone, no fewer than 120 railway cars filled with 4,170 crates trundled into Germany. The crates contained 21,000 art objects from 203 different collections. By Feliciano's reckoning, tens of thousands of stolen art works are missing to this day.

But, as he suggests, Switzerland was a clearinghouse for purloined art, and after the war, Swiss bureaucrats stifled an authentic investigation. Shades of the Swiss bank scandal.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Another year? This columnist wants to assure uncertain and burdened readers that no pleasure has been found – on a sustained level – equal to that of reading good books. They offer us knowledge, delight, strength and solace.

Some books, of course, can be read in an hour or two and returned to the shelf; others require a lifetime to savour their richness. These latter volumes should be owned and cherished – to travel with, to sleep beside, the most satisfying of all companions.

New books, or old books – what does it matter? If you have not read a book before, it is to all intents and purposes new, whether it was printed yesterday or 300 years ago.

Samuel Taylor Coleridge wrote in the early 19th century: "Readers may be divided into four classes: Sponges, who absorb all they read and return it nearly in the same state, only a little dirtied. Sand-glasses, who return nothing and are content to get through a book for the sake of getting through the time. Strain-bags, who retain merely the dregs of what they read. Mogul diamonds, equally rare and valuable, who profit by what they read and enable others to profit by it also."

Above all, when does one find time for books? One finds time by taking it.

As we confront a new year, what should a Jew know to be considered informed about Judaism? May I suggest the following 10 areas of knowledge:

- The ability to read Hebrew fluently enough to participate in a religious service.
- A knowledge of "functional" Hebrew and Yiddish. This means familiarity with those words and idioms which all Jews used, irrespective of the language they spoke, and which remained untranslated because they represented specifically Jewish conceptions, ideals and practices. Familiar examples include Shabbat, Tanach, kosher, get, kavod, rachmonus. There are many hundreds more which become part and parcel of the vocabulary of an informed Jew.
- A familiarity with Jewish customs and ceremonies: their usage, development and meaning through the centuries.
- A knowledge of major theological ideas. These constitute the heart of Judaism. Many Jews remain uninformed about such concepts as God and man, life and death, covenant and chosenness, messiah, prayer and the essential differences from Christianity and Islam.
- A survey of Jewish history from ancient times to the present, including events, movements and personalities across the centuries. Without a knowledge of the past, we lack the key to the present.
- Familiarity with the Tanach, the Hebrew Bible, with a grounding in its background, language and ideas.
- A smattering of knowledge about the Babylonian Talmud, including an awareness of its purpose, major figures, fundamental ideas and ethical teachings.
- An appreciation of modern Hebrew and Yiddish literature. Many of these masterpieces are now available in English translation.
- A knowledge of the history of Zionism, the modern resettlement of Israel, and the various schools of Zionist and Israeli thought – as well as the astonishing saga of the half-century of struggle and accomplishment.
- Basic information on the many-sided contemporary Jewish scene in North America and around the world.

Books in all the areas indicated above, are now widely available. They have reached an all time high, both in quality and in quantity. The new year is an opportunity to embark upon a program of planned study. The rewards are multiple and unending.

Challah on the highway

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today I am going to look at challah resources on the Jewish Highway.

But before I begin, I must address the families of all the bubbies, grandmothers and savtas out there. If your family has been passing a cherished challah recipe from generation to generation, NOTHING on the Internet will ever come close.

However, if you aren't one of the fortunate ones, there is a treasure trove of recipes out. And who knows, you may stumble across a recipe that one day your grandchildren will thank you for.

Although the word challah has come to refer to the golden loaf prepared for Shabbat and holidays, the term comes from the mitzvah in which bakers remove an olive-sized piece of dough and burn it in the oven as they say a special blessing [http://www.bridgesforpeace.com/dfjfoodhallah198.htm].

This "taking of challah" commemorates the Israelites who gave a portion of the dough from each large batch of home-made bread as an offering to the Lord which was offered to the priests of the Temple (Num. 15:17-21). [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/numbers/torah/15151517.htm] For more detailed laws of taking challah at Skokie, Illinois' Kollel Toras Chesed [http://www.mcs.net/~kollel/www/halacha/halacha.html].

The mitzvah of taking challah is considered one of the three fundamental mitzvot associated with Jewish women [http://www.ahavatisrael.com/am/women.html].

The others are niddah, the observance of the Torah's guidelines for maintaining the purity of marital life and the lighting of candles to welcome the Shabbat and festivals into our homes.

A challah, of course, is far more than just another tasty egg bread. It is a golden loaf steeped in thousands of years of tradition. From the baking to the cutting to the eating, there are many beautiful rituals associated with challah.

There are traditions about why it's braided [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask163.htm#Q1], why some people refrain from eating the end slice of the bread [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask087.htm#Q1] and why the blessing is said over two loaves on Shabbat [http://www.bridgesforpeace.com/dfjfoodhallah198.htm].

In Exodus 16:5, the children of Israel were commanded to gather a double portion of manna for the Sabbath. "On the sixth day they are to prepare what they bring in, and that is to be twice as much as they gather on the other days." [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/exodus/torah/16041605.htm]

Nowadays, the two loaves are symbolic of the double portion of manna given to the Israelites on the sixth day.

Another common custom is to add raisins to Rosh Hashanah challahs to augur a sweet year. That's what Auntie Rivka does in her Never Fail Challah for Rosh Hashanah [http://www.empirekosher.com/neverfail.htm].

Jeffrey Rosen, however, used an even sweeter ingredient in his challah when he had his girlfriend over for Shabbat [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk970124/suppido.htm].

"As she cut into the challah, the knife stopped cutting when it touched something inside the challah. Earlier in the day, I discreetly removed a small piece from the bottom of the challah, placed a small grey jewelry box in the centre of the challah, and reattached the piece of challah. She screamed and said a rat was in the challah. She looked inside the challah again and took out the grey jewelry box. She opened up the box and took out the ring. I asked her to marry me and she said 'yes.' She kept the jewelry box which has a knife mark on the top – a sign to remember our engagement."

Jeffrey and Amber Rosen now share all their Shabbats together in Palo Alto, California.

Challah-lujah!

Spinoza: Fame or shame?

By AVI BENLOLO

A controversial figure in Jewish history, Baruch de Spinoza was excommunicated from Amsterdam's Jewish community in 1656 because of his divergent views of Judaism.

Spinoza was born in Amsterdam on Nov. 24, 1634 to either Portuguese or Spanish Jews who sought refuge in the Netherlands from the Spanish Inquisition.

His philosophical views, which emerged in adulthood, were rooted in the teachings of the Talmud, the Kabbalah, the Bible and the commentaries of Ibn Ezra and Maimonides. His language repertoire included, Spanish, Portuguese, Hebrew, German, French, Italian and Latin.

In reading Spinoza's infamous work, A Theologico-Political Treatise, one is not sure whether to regard him in fame or shame.

Spinoza insulted his tight-knit Jewish community by attacking the entire notion of a deity, and charging there was no one "chosen people" – that all humans are alike.

Spinoza was in effect challenging the very same Jewish values that had led his parents and their peers to flee the Inquisition. The community therefore promptly proclaimed him a heretic.

Spinoza's thoughts and actions however could be understood as a manifestation of the Enlightenment – a period in which philosophers thought truth was something definite which can be achieved by rational method.

He was a well known figure within the inner circles of European intelligentsia and his work was of revolutionary proportions for his time, despite being rarely referred to by sociologists and political scientists in contemporary academia.

His passion and motivation seem to have been based on a personal quest for equality, liberty and civil rights under a sovereign democratic state – a fairly new concept in a post-feudal era. Perhaps because he himself felt persecuted he longed for the institution of these values in society.

Spinoza wrote, "since everyone has by nature a right to act deceitfully ... the basis and aim of a democracy is to avoid irrational desires and to bring men as far as possible under the control of reason so that they may live in peace and harmony."

Having been marginalized for his philosophical views, Spinoza pursued the notion of personal freedom through a social agreement. He wrote, "men must necessarily come to an agreement to live together as securely and well as possible if they are to enjoy as a whole the rights which naturally belong to them as individuals."

Ultimately, Spinoza was a character in conflict in Jewish history. His internal torment with religion versus his belief in individual liberty was manifested in his treatise.

Perhaps Spinoza's aspirations for a better society are vindicated by the establishment of democracies throughout the world.

Jews of 19th-century London

Wells, in Jewish literature, are often sites of fortuitous happenings, but that was decidedly not the case for a certain Mrs. Hyams as she passed through Duke's Place, East London, in September 1873.

According to the London Jewish Chronicle, the lady "stumbled over the pavement close to the Great Synagogue and found herself precipitated beneath a stone, and fell into an unused well, existence of which was unknown. The depth of the well was over 20 feet and breadth 8 or 9 feet. An immediate alarm attracted persons in the neighbourhood and Lewis Isaacs soon procured a ladder, and with the aid of one workman the lady was rescued."

Mrs. Hyams suffered shock and internal injuries, and a few weeks later Mr. Hyams of Aldgate stood before the London Sewers Commission, requesting compensation for his wife's mishap. According to a subsequent story in the Chronicle, she had fallen into the abandoned well after the ground gave away beneath her.

"In reply to a question, the petitioner stated this was a well which had not been used for some time. Wood had been placed on top of the well which became so rotten, it had given way. On suggestion of the chairman, the matter was referred to the Streets Committee."

A recently-published book carries this record of the Hyams family misfortune and many other stories from Jewish London of the 1870s. Anyone with Anglo-Jewish ancestry will be interested in perusing The Jewish Victorian: Genealogical Information from the Jewish Newspapers, 1871-1880, edited by Doreen Berger (Robert Boyd Publications, UK).

Berger has transcribed all of the birth, marriage, death and social announcements from three London Jewish newspapers – the Jewish Chronicle, Jewish World and Jewish Record – for that intermediate decade of Jewish history which immediately preceded the era of Jewish mass migration to England (and America). She also included many interesting news accounts.

Consider the brief tempest occasioned by the arrival to London of Rabbi Hirsch Dainow, known as the Polish Magid. Defying an order by the Chief Rabbi that he not be permitted to speak "except under ecclesiastical sanction," the charismatic rabbi spoke and drew a large crowd. The scene was repeated for several weeks, the number of listeners growing with each renewed prohibition against the rabbi's public lectures.

"On Sabbath last, the crowd of auditors was so great intervention of two constables was required and they had difficulty in expressing the unruly ardour of the throng, who pressed forward in the hope of gaining access to Zetland Hall."

Soon a fund was established to bring Rabbi Dainow and his family to London permanently. No sooner in London, however, than the Polish Magid died of pleurisy at age 45.

If you're seeking relatives, it may be hard to find them here, since so many people shared a handful of anglicized surnames such as Barnett, Davis, Harris, Hart, Jacobs, Levy and Salomon; and since, further, Victorian-era propriety preferred an initial over a complete first name. Nevertheless, these nearly 600 pages are a remarkable contribution, for which Berger deserves our thanks.

Because of the breadth of material included, one can read these entries as one would a novel – sometimes with laughter, too often with tears.

Consider, lastly, the case of Mrs. M. Jacobs, whose body was found in the River Thames: "It is said her death is the result of a practical joke played upon her. Some fifteen or twenty years back the husband of this woman deserted her and went to America. She might have fared badly, but for the charity of the benevolent. Whether or not she heard from her husband leaves room for conjecture; but on the day of her disappearance she received a letter purporting to be from him with an English postmark, stating her husband had embarked for this country. Without breathing a word to anyone she left her home without bonnet or shawl, saying she was going on an errand in the neighbourhood. She did go to a chandler's shop and bought some sand to enable her to sink quickly and was no more seen till her body was found in the river five weeks later and recognized by means of an earring she wore."

Organ donated to First Nations

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — A Wurlitzer organ that has sat unnoticed and unused at Temple Har Zion for several years, has a new home at the Shawanaga First Nation, near Parry Sound.

Chief Dwayne Pamajewon was at the temple recently to accept the organ, which will be used at one of his community churches.

Cantor Martin Steinhouse of Temple Har Zion, said that they first met Pamajewon when campers and staff from Camp George – a newly established camp near Parry Sound, affiliated with the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism – were helping to paint a church that was on the property, as part of a tikkun olam project.

"We noticed an old organ that had begun to rot, and when we asked the chief if he wanted our organ, he was very happy."

While there, Steinhouse said, the campers visited the Shawanaga health and wellness centre, and met with the chief. "They really got a feel for what native Canadians are like. It is very important for our kids to learn about other cultures, and in turn, kids at Shawanaga had a chance to learn a little bit about Judaism."

Planned for this summer, is an exchange day between Camp George and Shawanaga First Nation.

"Our visit to Shawanaga was the culmination of a three-week project. By going out into the community, campers learned what tikkun olam is all about. It is important for youth to learn that we care about other communities as well as our own," said Steinhouse.

In accepting the key to the organ, Pamajewon, who drove down in a truck in order to take back the organ, said, "We are very grateful for this gesture from Temple Har Zion. We will enjoy having the organ in our community.

"This will help bridge a relationship between the two communities, something that needs to be done more often."

Lung cancer claims Cohen

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An overflow crowd of hundreds of people filled the main hall and a secondary hall at Hart House at the University of Toronto last week for a memorial service for Toronto novelist Matt Cohen, who died Dec. 2 of lung cancer at the age of 56.

Obituary

Cohen authored some 30 books between the publication of his first novel, Korsoniloff (1969) and his last, Elizabeth and After (1999), which won the Governor General's Award for English-language fiction in November.

Although in deteriorating health, Cohen attended the awards ceremony in Ottawa, where he joked that he had once hoped to receive such an honour while still in possession of a full head of curly hair.

Matthew Cohen was born in Kingston, Ont., on Dec. 30, 1942, to Jewish parents who were second-generation Canadians and who "spoke unaccented English and had long ago made their psychological acts of assimilation," he once said.

The grandson of a rabbi, he often used Jewish characters and explored Jewish themes in his novels, which included The Spanish Doctor (1984), Nadine (1986), Emotional Arithmetic (1990), Freud: The Paris Notebooks (1991) and The Bookseller (1993).

Many of his books were translated and became bestsellers in France, the Netherlands and other countries.

Cohen once said he was thought of predominantly as a Jewish writer in Europe, but first and foremost as a Canadian writer in his own country. In a few of his books, including Elizabeth and After, he seems to tread a fine line between the two possibilities, using Jewish characters on a distinctly Canadian landscape while downplaying traditional Jewish literary themes involving exile and feelings of uprootedness.

He delved far more deeply into matters of Jewish consciousness and history in The Spanish Doctor, which focuses on Jewish characters in pre-Inquisition Spain.

Nadine, set in France, tells a story of Holocaust survivors. That story is continued in Emotional Arithmetic, which brings the narrative to the fictitious eastern Ontario town of Salem, a common setting for Cohen's novels.

Cohen's friend, the poet Dennis Lee, described him as a dedicated father and someone with such a passion for literature that he would read long-running serialized stories to his children at bedtime. Cohen and his wife, Patsy Aldana, had a son and a daughter. He also had two step-children.

"Matt was very bright; he was just mad for ideas," Lee said. "He reinvented himself for The Spanish Doctor, a project for which he explored Jewish themes in history and the complex interplay between the old world and the new."

In his eulogy, Rabbi Dow Marmur said Cohen's contribution to Canadian literature "has added much to our love of Canada and added much to our understanding of Jewish identity.

"All who knew Matt Cohen speak of his unique, engaging and often self-deprecating sense of humour so characteristic of Jews," Rabbi Marmur said.

"A man who could finish two books in the few months between being told of his terminal illness and his death is one whose hope never abandoned him."

Rabbi Marmur also noted Cohen's dedication to his family: "Of all his creations, none were more important to him than his children and his family. They were the anchor of his life. They made it possible for him to live in serenity and to die in peace."

Cohen started the manuscript that would become Elizabeth and After in 1986 and had been ready to abandon it. Encouraged by his editor, he eventually completed the work, only to see it bring him his greatest recognition in Canada with the Governor General's award.

Cohen had been shortlisted for that honour twice before, most recently for his 1996 novel, Last Seen. Ironically, that book deals with a character who loses his brother to lung cancer, just as Cohen had done in real life.

That his own death from lung cancer should follow so closely is a sad case of life imitating art.

Heading For Another Record Campaign

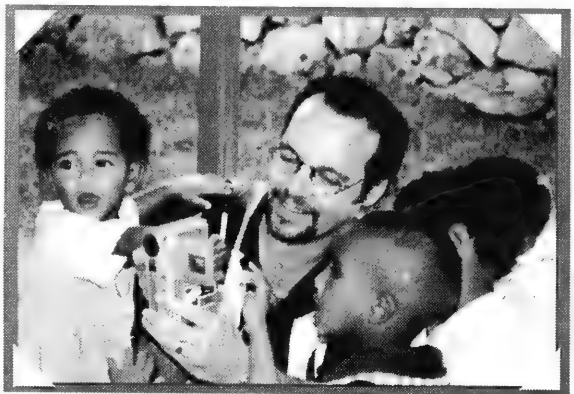
UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 is expected to reach at least $42 million.

So far, the campaign stands at approximately $35 million, with about 4,000 existing donors still to be contacted. The total to date is more than $2 million ahead of last year. If the current trend continues, Campaign 2000 will hit the $42 million mark, setting a new record. Last year's campaign raised $40.5 million.

A series of telethons, currently underway, marks the final push of this year's drive.

Mel Wolfond, who is co-chairing Campaign 2000 with David Engel, attributes the campaign's success to a strong economy and a "tremendously generous community." He is particularly pleased with the number of increased gifts made by thousands of donors. "People have been stepping up to fill in the void left by government cutbacks and growing demands for human services," adds Wolfond.

Funds raised by the UJA Federation annual campaign are allocated to local and oversees beneficiary agencies that assist the vulnerable, rescue Jews from danger all over the world and strengthening Jewish identity.



Peter Ekstein and other leading UJA contributors recently participated in a mission to Kishinev and Israel where they visited newly-arrived Ethiopian Jews at the Mevasseret Zion absorption centre near Jerusalem. "Above all, the success of the campaign is all about people," says Engel. "Everyone from those who visit face to face with contributors to those who help organize events and make countless telephone calls are the ones who truly make things happen."

"Hitting the $42 million mark is crucial for our agencies which are faced with mounting demands for programs and services and they should be able to count on funding for people in need," adds Wolfond.

If you would like to make a gift to UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 please call (416) 631-5705, mail a cheque to UJA Federation, 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto, M2R 3V2 or visit the Jewish Toronto Web Site (www.jewishtoronto.net) for Internet payments.

Congratulations To A Class Act

UJA Federation President Alan Sandler congratulates Anne Tanenbaum at the recent dedication of the new Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). She was the leading contributor toward the construction of the newly re-furbished Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre which now houses over 1,100 high school students in the heart of Jewish Toronto. Phase one of the $8.5 million capital project was a joint venture of UJA Federation and CHAT as part of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow community development initiative.

Scholastic Connections

Meirav Alon shows grade 5 USDS students where Eilat is located on map of Israel.

Local Jewish day school students are becoming a little closer to Israeli school children thanks to a recent visit from a group of Jewish educators.

The nine teacher delegation from Israel spent a week getting to know students and teachers, both in and out of the classroom, as part of the ongoing Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative sponsored by UJA Federation. The visit was the second part of a teacher exchange program that began when a contingent of 20 Toronto area day school teachers participated in a mission to Eilat and Israel's southern Eilot region twinned with Toronto.

"We felt a very warm welcome," says Daniella Gerassy, who headed the contingent of educators, representing the nine schools participating in the P2K Living Bridge program. The program, funded by UJA Federation, builds lasting connections between Torontonians and Israelis living in and around Eilat. Gerassy believes that hundreds of letters written by school children from Eilat that were distributed to local students will go a long way toward creating lasting personal ties.

"The children were so excited to receive the letters," notes Gerassy, who will also be carrying hundreds of return letters home with her. "It was wonderful how curious the kids here are about what life is like for their counterparts, who are just as curious about them."

"We are here to engage the students and teachers and interest them in discovering new links to their friends in Israel," adds educator Yonatan Posen. While in Toronto all nine delegates spent a few hours teaching in various classrooms across the city. "Your community's Jewish education is very impressive," notes Posen. "We have a lot to learn from each other."

Teacher Yonatan Posen, with grade 8 Associated students, says strengthening Jewish identity is just as important for Israeli school children as it is for those living in the Diaspora.

"We have been doing wonderful things for the people living in Eilat and the region of Eilot for 10 years," explains Warren Kimel, who Co-Chairs UJA Federation's P2K initiative with Randy Shiff, which sponsors a number of community development programs in addition to "people to people" Living Bridge projects. "P2K offers wonderful opportunities to develop mutually beneficial ties based upon common goals and a common identity," adds Kimel.

New BBYO director aims to revitalize organization

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After eight years of declining membership, B'nai Brith Youth Organization needed a boost.

Membership had dwindled to 230, and awareness of the organization was low, said Jeff Wagman, chair of BBYO's adult board of directors.

So it created a new position – director of development – and hired Dena Libman.

Libman, 26, has a BA in history from York University, and in July, she received a master's degree in social work and a Jewish communal service certificate from New York's Yeshiva University.

She began her new job in September. "It's the best kind of job," she said recently at her office on Bathurst Street.

"You can stare at a budget all day, and in the evening, you're surrounded by 40 teens that just make [you] laugh," she said with a smile.

Libman is responsible for recruiting volunteers, increasing BBYO's membership and raising awareness of the organization.

Dena Libman

These are important tasks because BBYO's membership began declining in 1991 when B'nai Brith Canada withdrew its funding, Wagman said.

"We were cut off totally overnight and we were evicted from Hove Street. We spent five years concentrating on finances and nothing else," he said.

In the mid '60s and early '70s – the heyday of BBYO – the organization had more than 1,000 members, but by the early '90s, membership had dwindled to about 500, and the community barely knew the youth group still existed, Wagman said.

He realized the organization had to raise its profile. So BBYO increased its marketing to the community and recently revitalized its alumni association.

In late July, Libman was hired, and at the end of September, BBYO moved from Centre Street to its current location at Council House, the National Council of Jewish Women building at 4700 Bathurst St.

Most of BBYO's members live north of Steeles, and Libman hopes the new North York location will attract more members from the 416 area.

In fact, she hopes to recruit members from all across the GTA.

"When I get a phone call and the question is 'Is there a chapter in my area?' I want the answer to be yes, whether that's a call from the Beaches, High Park, York Mills or Richmond Hill," she said.

Libman also hopes to recruit recent immigrants.

"I had the impression from our members that there wasn't an interaction between newcomers and Canadian teens and I think that [interaction] is important for both groups."

She is working with Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) to form a new BBYO chapter for Russian teens.

Toronto high school set to celebrate 40th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After the first reunion of William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute in 1985, Larry Anklewicz says he was "on a high for a week."

The Toronto lawyer and freelance writer is looking forward to repeating the experience five months from now. A graduate of the class of 1962, Anklewicz is chairing the reunion committee to commemorate the school's 40th anniversary next May 27, a Saturday evening.

The school, located on Tillplain Road in North York, was originally planned as a junior high, Anklewicz told The CJN. But the rapidly increasing student population at Northview Heights Secondary School, on Finch Avenue West near Bathurst Street, meant another high school was needed to serve the area.

Southview Secondary School opened in 1960 and a contest to rename the school was run under the auspices of the history department, Anklewicz recalled.

Students voted on the name "William Lyon Mackenzie" following presentations by 10 of their peers on 10 famous Canadians at a school assembly.

Anklewicz himself made a case for using the name Thomas D'Arcy McGee, who – like Mackenzie – was a politician and journalist and – unlike him – one of the few Canadian politicians to be assassinated.

Mackenzie, the school, used to have a Jewish student population of about 90 percent.

"The school closed down on Jewish holidays, [but] not officially," Anklewicz said. Today, an estimated 50 percent of the students are Jewish.

Among Mac's better-known alumni are Jeanne Beker of Fashion Television fame; David Bloom, chair and CEO of Shoppers Drug Mart; Steve Jacobs, weather anchor at CFTO-TV; talk show host Marsha Lederman of radio station Talk 640; Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights; actors Avery Saltzman and David Eisner; Stephen Speisman, Ontario Jewish Archives director; not to mention CJN editorial staff Jeff Rosen, Leila Speisman and this reporter.

"I think almost every profession is full of Mackenzie graduates," said Anklewicz, whose wife Gerry (née Singer) teaches English at the school.

The reunion committee is appealing to alumni for memorabilia, such as photographs, to display at the reunion.

Unlike Mackenzie's previous reunions, which marked the school's 25th and 30th anniversaries, the upcoming event boasts its own Web site, http://reunion.wlmac.toronto.on.ca. Thus far, more than 120 alumni have registered on it.

Inquiries have come from as far away as Singapore, said committee member Ron Gold, a contemporary of Anklewicz' and the school's first student council president.

"I hope as many people as possible will come out," said Gold, whose wife Dianne was the first student to return to Mackenzie as a teacher (she now teaches French at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto). Their son Joe was student council president from 1991 to 1992.

Admission to the reunion will be $12 in advance, $15 at the door.

For further information, to offer assistance or memorabilia, call Mary Lavoie at the school, 416-395-3330, or e-mail Anklewicz at ankle@interlog.com.

VAUGHAN — Or Haemet Sephardic School is opening its annual dinner to the public for the first time this year.

The event, a fundraiser, will take place Jan. 10, 2000 at the Sephardic Kehila Centre at 7026 Bathurst St., in which the school is housed.

"Drawing upon our unique heritage, we wanted to centre the dinner around the hilula of a tzaddik," said Messod Boussidan, vice-president of Or Haemet.

A hilula, for the uninitiated, is more or less, the Sephardi counterpart of an Ashkenazi yahrzeit. The difference is that it's a celebratory event, explained Boussidan. The upcoming dinner will honor the memory of Rabbi Yisrael Abuhatzira, the Moroccan sage also known as the Baba Sali (Arabic for father of prayer).

The word hilula is Aramaic for wedding, signifying the "concept of the great soul of a tzaddik being wedded with God," said Boussidan. "We honour his work and his accomplishments."

The hilula is "meant to elevate the soul of the tzaddik," added Meir Gabay, dinner chair. "Every brachah, the divrei Torah, are all meant to elevate [his] soul."

Moroccan Jews also refer to the Baba Sali as Haadmor Rebbi Abuhatzira, the first honorific being an acronym for the Hebrew words Adoneinu, Moreinu v'Rabeinu (our master, our teacher and our rabbi).

The dinner will also honour the memory of Leon Oziel, a Moroccan Jewish community leader in Toronto.

Oziel will be the first inductee into Yachin ou Boaz, a new honour to be bestowed annually by the school. Its name refers to the two main pillars of the Beit Hamikdash.

The evening's program will feature keynote speaker Rabbi Shlomo Diamond, rosh kollel, Sephardic Torah Centre and rosh yeshiva, Ilan High School for Girls in Deal, N.J.

Les Frères Edery, a Montreal group specializing in Andalusian music, will perform, and Shir Yedidout, the Sephardic Kehila Centre's new five-member adult choir, will make its debut. The choir's name refers to a book of piyyutim (liturgical songs) written by early Spanish, and later, Moroccan Torah scholars.

Tickets to the dinner are $180 per person. For further information, contact Yaël Elfassy at 905-669-7654, ext. 225.

Mom and Dad are moving to Two Neptune Drive, Baycrest's new condo-style development

You're in your late 40s, Mom's just turned 70 and Dad's just shy of 80. Or Dad is on his own. Lately, you've been catching yourself worrying about your parents.

It may not be anything in particular. It's just that they're getting older. As loving children, we want to know that our parents are staying healthy and enjoying their independence.

"Your mom and dad would never want to think that you're worrying about them but it's natural for children to feel concerned when their parents get older," says Carol Cotton, marketing director for Two Neptune Drive. "Finding a living environment where an older person can maintain their independence and, if needed, get help with things like personal grooming and housework, is ideal for everyone, including children."

That environment is Two Neptune Drive. A condominium-style life lease residence for mature adults sponsored by Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Two Neptune Drive has been attracting active, independent adults looking for a living environment that allows them to travel without worrying, enjoy an active social life and indulge interests and hobbies. Studies show that an active social life is tied to longevity and health. Located at Bathurst and Neptune, the building, now under construction, has been designed specifically to meet the changing needs of adults as they grow older.

The services provided by Baycrest are an appealing concept to Two Neptune's singles and couples. Many of them don't need the services right now but are reassured that they can if and when they do. Services that provide help with dressing, bathing, grooming, shopping, laundry, housekeeping and meals, all for a fee.

A concierge trained to help access Baycrest services will also be available to provide help from making your move easier to generally giving you a hand 24 hours a day. A Baycrest recreation director will also be in the building on a part-time basis.

It's reassuring to know that your suite is equipped with 24 hour personal security emergency response so that all you do in case of emergency is press a button.

Living at Two Neptune Drive can help maintain your health

The concept of Two Neptune Drive, says Sam Ruth, former CEO of Baycrest and one of the key movers behind the development, is to give seniors the freedom to enjoy themselves without worrying about their changing needs.

"I'm 78. People tell me that I'm young and I feel young. If you're like me, maintaining your independence is important so you want to stay as healthy as you can. Living at Two Neptune Drive can help you maintain your health."

Elegantly appointed light-filled 1 bedroom, 1 bedroom + den, 2 bedroom, 2 bedroom + den suites range from 650-1250 sq. ft. Highlights in many suites include spacious eat-in kitchens, open concept living and dining areas, masters with ensuites and a 2nd bedroom ideal for a den or study. Five appliances include an in-suite washer and dryer.

Special design features make life more comfortable

Ensuite bathrooms are prepped for grab bars, rocker-style light switches and electrical outlets are placed at a position on the wall that allows easy access, kitchen pantries are provided for ease of use. Other features include lever-style taps, ranges with front controls, wider doorways, special lighting and flooring, a chair rail offering support along the hallway to each suite and a handy parcel shelf at each suite entrance.

Expect an active social life

Comfort and aesthetic appeal go hand in hand. Amenities include a games room, lounge, party room, a landscaped garden, fully equipped fitness facility and library. If you're really energetic, the Baycrest shuttle will take you over to the nearby Wagman Centre where there is a hairdresser, synagogue and convenience store. Your automatic Wagman membership entitles you to access programs in the warm water pool, gym, greenhouse, jogging/walking path and other services such as out-patient clinics and programs.

Life lease popular concept

The life lease concept is another special feature. Under this concept, you retain equity interest in your home while enjoying freedom from the worries of home ownership. With a life lease, you enjoy the "right to occupy" your residence. Ownership is retained by Baycrest Residential Properties who ensure that a standard of excellence is maintained. At any time, you or your family may sell your "right to occupy" at an appraised market value and keep the proceeds from the sale less a small administrative fee to Baycrest. You maintain your equity just as if you owned!

Prices have been kept "affordable" and currently start at $135,900. Drop by Two Neptune Drive's sales centre at 3539 Bathurst just across from Baycrest. For more details, call 416-932-2560.

Your mother and I have something exciting to tell you...

What if your parents announced that they were moving to Two Neptune Drive? Told you that they had chosen a fabulous suite with room for the grandkids to stay over, had a concierge, a Baycrest recreation director and if they wanted it, help with shopping, grooming, housekeeping, meals for a fee. All of this and a great social life, freedom to travel and enjoy their hobbies. What would you say?

Judaism, transplants not contradictory: rabbi

The challenges, from a Jewish perspective, revolve around related issues such as determining time of death and the Jewish belief in immediate burial, according to Rabbi Bulka.

He believes the Jewish community has allowed such issues to "obscure the big picture."

"In fairness," he admitted, "it's hard to adjust to a new reality. We've always believed in immediate and full burial...There's no reason why we have to feel sorry we took that stance, but it created a mind-set that says anything less than that is halachically unacceptable, when in fact just the opposite is the case."

The general consensus among his colleagues is that brainstem death – the medical criterion – is also acceptable from a Jewish perspective, he said.

There is nothing fundamentally contradictory about Judaism and transplants, said Rabbi Bulka. "There may be nuances. We would be very insistent that the only thing taken out is what was necessary, but that everything else be treated respectfully...so that a full and complete burial can take place."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Jews, who place such a high premium on saving a life, should be at the forefront of addressing the shortage of organs, he said. In Canada alone, more than 100 people a year die while waiting for organ transplants.

Even though new medical techniques have made it possible in some cases to save two lives with one organ, for example, by dividing a donor liver in two, availability of donor organs remains a critical problem.

Rabbi Bulka believes his colleagues should encourage their congregants to think in terms of saving lives through organ donation. "It hasn't happened with the type of fervour I think it should."

* * *

In October 1998, CJN typesetter Larry Tremblay began a medical leave of absence from work. Cirrhosis of the liver, due to unknown causes, had eroded his health, and he needed a transplant.

Larry Tremblay

"I think it's raised the consciousness of a lot of people here about the whole issue. I'm impressed with the patience and courage he's shown," said Gary Laforet, the paper's general manager. "Everybody's excited about the prospect of him returning to work."

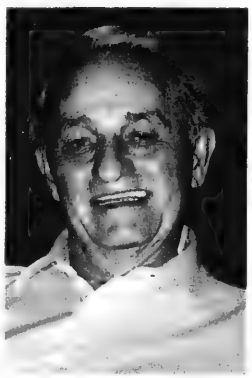
Tremblay received a new liver in August at the Toronto Hospital.

Although he experienced post-surgical complications – necessitating a four-week hospital stay and a three-week convalescence at the Baycrest Centre – he is recovering well and says he hopes to be back on the job next spring.

Before the transplant, Tremblay suffered constant fatigue, mood swings, apathy, weight loss and severe fluid build-up. About twice a month he'd enter hospital to have fluid drained from his body – up to seven litres at a time.

Tremblay, 62, says he knows he is lucky. At any one time, there are approximately 1,200 people on the waiting list for organ transplants in Ontario. The list is constantly in flux, as new names are added and others are deleted. Only about 600 to 650 people a year receive new organs.

At the top of the list are the sickest patients, usually those in intensive care.



Sam Ganz

But to qualify for a transplant, a patient must be well enough to have a good chance of surviving.

"If I believe the chances of survival are significantly less than 50 percent, they don't get a transplant," said Dr. Gary Levy, director of the Toronto-based Multi-Organ Transplant Program and a professor of medicine at the University of Toronto.

"It may not be right but it's reality...because of the shortage of organs. If we don't succeed, two people die – the one who never got to get a transplant, and the one who did and failed."

The one-year survival rate for all organ transplants is about 80 to 90 percent, said Levy. "People aren't aware that it works," he said, noting that some female patients have borne babies – healthy babies – after their transplants.

After five years, the survival rate for transplant patients drops to about 70 percent, but some of the deaths are due to unrelated causes, Levy pointed out.

Dr. Gary Levy [Frances Kraft photo]

18-month wait for liver not uncommon

Gender, socio-economic background and race are not taken into consideration when a recipient is selected, but body size is, Levy said.

The size of the organ being donated must be compatible with the size of the recipient. "All other factors being equal, you wait your turn."

The program Levy directs coordinates transplants of organs including hearts, lungs, livers, kidneys and pancreas for the greater Toronto area and the province of Ontario.

Tremblay's 18-month wait for a liver was not uncommon. The average wait for a liver is 12 to 18 months, said Levy. For kidneys, recipients wait three to four years. Hearts and lungs are usually found within six months.

While Tremblay was on the list, he and his wife Linda made sure they were constantly accessible by phone, cell phone or pager.

From his own experience and what he gleaned attending informational meetings for transplant candidates, Tremblay came up with what he called his four rules of thumb for transplant patients:

- faith in your creator;
- faith in your medical staff;
- the love and help of your family;
- the will to survive.

"Without those," he said, "I don't think anyone should even consider transplants."

* * *

While Tremblay is still awaiting the go-ahead to return to work, Sam Ganz has already passed that milestone.

A 70-year-old businessman, he received a new liver in January, was able to play golf this summer and is now working at his family-run company every day.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl

Both Tremblay and Ganz gave credit to their wives and families for their support, noting particularly their wives' vigilance when preparing meals. The men also praised the dedication of the medical professionals they encountered, and mentioned that many people prayed for them. Each of those factors, they believe, played a role in their recoveries.

A Holocaust survivor, Ganz was first diagnosed with a liver problem about 20 years ago. He believes he acquired hepatitis C when he was in concentration camp.

"It's a very slow-progressing sickness," he said.

About five years ago Ganz' condition deteriorated when he was hospitalized for a severe episode of internal bleeding. He received four pints of blood, medication and a "not very encouraging" prognosis.

Suffering from fatigue but otherwise functioning well, Ganz sought a second opinion and was advised to consider a transplant.

"It was like a shock to me. A transplant is something you read about."

He remained on the waiting list for about two years, but, after a family meeting with Levy, it was decided to remove his name because he was doing so well. He continued to be monitored closely.

"Then my liver went bad," Ganz recalled. When an ultrasound showed malignant tumors, he went back on the list, as an urgent case.

Within three weeks, he received a new liver at the Toronto Hospital. He said the wait was difficult, knowing nothing was being done to treat the cancer, and not knowing how soon an appropriate liver would become available.

Surgery and recovery proceeded without complications, and Ganz was assured the cancer had not spread.

He attributes his smooth recovery – nine days in hospital – to the fact that he took care of himself prior to surgery by exercising and eating a healthy diet, as his doctors recommended.

From a psychological standpoint, the support of his family was equally important, he said.

But Ganz' own "optimistic outlook on life in general, and this situation in particular, helped him an awful lot," said his wife Gitta.

"I see the sun shining most of the time," agreed Ganz. "I consider myself extremely lucky."

Women's role in the Bible examined at lecture

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While the Bible presents a patriarchal society, it does not prescribe patriarchy as an ideal way of life, said Sara Horowitz, a professor of literature at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

"Patriarchy itself isn't sacred ... [it] is the society that existed back then...The Bible is there to show us how to behave ethically, but [it] has to do so in the context of a real society," she said.

Horowitz, the former director of the Jewish Studies program at the University of Delaware, spoke at a lecture titled Looking for Love in All the Wrong Places? Women in the Bible.

The talk was part of a learning series presented by Women: An Agenda for Change, a program of the Toronto chapter of Canadian Friends of The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in partnership with Beit Rayim Synagogue.

Horowitz discussed several women in the Bible who were strong and proactive despite living in a patriarchal society.

"We constantly see women in the Bible who step out from the mould and the Bible does not step on them and it does not leave us with the impression that they did something wrong," Horowitz said in an interview following the talk.

She cited the story of Tamar and Judah in Genesis, as an example. According to the biblical tale, Tamar's first and second husbands, Er and Onan, who were brothers, were killed by God for being wicked.

The law, in biblical times, stipulated that if a man dies without children, his wife has to marry within the family and bear a child to pass on the deceased man's family line.

Judah, father of Er and Onan, thought his daughter-in-law was a "killer wife" and told Tamar to remain a widow in her father's home until his son Shelah was grown. But Judah, fearing Shelah would be harmed by Tamar, tried to prevent the marriage once Shelah was of age.

Essentially powerless, Tamar takes action by disguising herself as a harlot and seducing Judah so that she can become pregnant and carry on the family line.

"[She] fulfills biblical law even though her father-in-law tries to prevent this from happening," said Horowitz. "It is clear that God thinks she does the right thing.

"You think that if you read a biblical story about a prostitute...she's not going to be the one who is put forth as a model or the hero of the story and yet she is. She's the only one who acts with any propriety or any responsibility to upholding biblical law."

Horowitz also discussed Rebecca, who is described in the Bible as not just beautiful but strong and generous as well.

Horowitz had divided the audience into groups to study biblical betrothal scenes that take place at wells.

One group studied the scene at the well where Rebecca meets Abraham's servant; he has been instructed to find a wife for Isaac, Abraham's son.

The servant asks Rebecca for some water to test her strength of character. She proves her generosity by giving both the servant and his camels water.

In all the other betrothal scenes, the women need help getting water from the wells.

Rebecca's scene "emphasizes her self-sufficiency. She doesn't need the man at the well to help – she's helping him," Horowitz said.

Rebecca is aggressive; she is a doer and a go-getter, Horowitz added. "The Bible approves of her strength."

Rebecca is consulted as to whether or not she wants to travel with the servant to his master's house; in contrast, Isaac, who is considerably more passive than Rebecca, is not even present when his wife is being chosen, Horowitz said.

Task force to canvass Russian families

It also cast a light on Toronto's growing Russian-Jewish emigre population. But Cole said community officials and the police are satisfied that violence "is not specific to them."

Romberg said his team will meet several more times before it issues a final report of recommendations, before the end of January.

Because there are many non-Jewish Russian families in the Bathurst Street corridor above Finch Avenue, Romberg feels "this isn't just a Jewish issue. It's a neighbourhood issue."

In many of the densely packed high-rise buildings in the area, both parents work, affording young people time – sometimes too much of it, Romberg said.

The task force will canvass Russian families, especially young people, on what programs are available, and what more can be done.

Romberg said local Jewish groups, such as B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) and the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), will also have a role to play.

In addition to the ad hoc task force, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto said it would establish a memorial fund for Jewish youth in Matti's name, while the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC) pledged to set up a fund for a youth and leadership program in Matti's memory.

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, executive director of the JRCC, told The CJN the fund in Matti's name is aimed at helping Jewish teens develop social skills, self-esteem and to "explore their background."

He decried the lack of organized afterschool activities. He said too many teens have too much time on their hands and too little supervision.

"We have a lot of work ahead," the rabbi said of the CJC-led task force.

JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe said his agency has been involved with the Russian community for a long time, having had social workers at Northview Heights, Fisherville, Rockford Road, and other schools for years.

He said JF&CS social workers also provided trauma counselling to Northview Heights students following Matti's death.

Rabbi Zaltzman said the JRCC fund will be fueled by private and organizational donations. Contributions may be sent to: JRCC Matti Baranovsky Fund, 5987 Bathurst St., unit 3, Toronto, M2R 1Z3.

"חכמת הבייגלה":

כמו בכל העולם, גם בישראל יש מקום לרובד הספרותי הזה ואין ספק שיש לזיאנר הזה יותר קוראים מאשר לעמוס עוז או אפילו מאיר שליו. מה כן - בעוד שנה איש לא יזכור אותו.

רק מה אם אינכם בני עשרים ושמונה, ואינכם כיום מצפון תל אביב (מה שבטוח אינכם), תיזהרו מחוכמת הבייגלה". הבייגלה הזה יעשה לכם קלקול קיבה.

משפחות ברוכות\מרובות ילדים:

בדיון בכנסת על תמיכה במשפחות עוני, העז חבר כנסת של "שינוי" לומר את המשפט הפוליטיקלי אינקורקט: לדעתו, משפחות מרובות ילדים אינן "ברוכות ילדים" כפי שנהוג לומר בישראל. כל הסטטיסטיקות מראות שמגודל מסיים ומעלה, אין סיכוי שאנשים יוכלו להעניק לילדיהם את המינימום הדרוש לעלות מעל קו העוני. בהקשר זה גם הזכירו שבשנה האחרונה נשכחו ומתו שלושה תינוקות במכוניות לוהטות בקיץ, ובכולן היו אלה משפחות עם מספר גדול במיוחד של ילדים. לא צריך הרבה דמיון כדי לנחש אילו עצקות עוררה הצהרתו של חבר הכנסת, וצעקות נגד של אלה שמסכימים עם דעתו

סיפור נקי וכשר ששלח לי חברי ד"ר גרי ארבוס:
יהודי טוב מטייל להנאתו ביער כשלפתע מבחין בו דוב ורודף אחריו לתוך מערה. היהודי מבין שזה פחות או יותר הסוף והוא מתפלל "שמע ישראל". לפתע הוא מבחין לתדהמתו שגם הדוב מתפלל. הוא אומר לעצמו: "איזה מזל שזה דוב יהודי, ולא סתם דוב", אבל אז הוא מקשיב ביתר זהירות ומבחין שהדוב מברך: "מוציא לחם מן הארץ".

Governor General joins Chanukah celebration

BY DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Governor General Adrienne Clarkson and her husband John Ralston Saul were guests of honour at a Chanukah celebration held at Congregation Machzikei Hadas.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka told the guests that Clarkson and the synagogue have something in common: the original building used by Machzikei Hadas, was in the neighbourhood where Madame Clarkson and her family lived when they arrived in Canada.

The governor general, in turn, spoke warmly of her childhood in that neighbourhood, and of the welcoming friendship her family had received from their Jewish neighbours. "The history of my family here in Ottawa is inextricably connected to the Jewish community," she said.

"I do feel a great connection with the Jewish people and with the Jewish community in Ottawa. When I was growing up, it was a very small town and I felt very much it was a place of diversity, ethnicity...a beacon for the future.

"In the world, you are a group of 14 million human beings, and you continue to light a light for justice, for civilization and for everything that is right and true. I thank you for that."

Joel Taller, president of the congregation, presented Clarkson with a silver chanukiyah, the first at the governor general's residence. "I can assure you," she said, "that it will be lit every year," said Clarkson.

Following the musical portion of the program presented by the Hillel Academy choir, Clarkson and Saul joined the congregation for refreshments.

Later the same evening, David Sultan, ambassador of Israel to Canada, and his wife, entertained members of the community at a Chanukah party at their residence, Kinneret.

Jewish Book Fair gets record sales

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Tamar Barr, director of cultural arts and special events for the Rady Jewish Community Centre, says that this year's annual Jewish Book Fair held recently at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, had record sales.

"There were a lot of people, right from the first day we opened, and sales were steady throughout. We sold a lot of product."

The fair opened with readings by local authors and writers Sheldon Oberman, Allan Levine, Carol Rose, Sharon Chisvin and Robyn Meyerowitz.

Among the highlights of the week were presentations by historian David Kirk of the University of Victoria, who spoke about Nazi kidnapping of Slavic children during the Holocaust in order to raise them as Aryans, and the life of Christian Zionist Pierre Van Paasen; and Malka Marom (formerly part of the duo of Malka and Joso) talking about her new novel, Sulha.

"The turnout for Marom was really strong," says Barr. "We also had good attendance at our story-telling cabaret with Laurie Block, Kayla Gordon, Sheldon Oberman and Rabbi Neal Rose."

Poverty among Jews explored at conference

'There's a reluctance in the Jewish community to acknowledge it': Moscovitch

By MATT BELLAN
The Jewish Post & News

WINNIPEG — Poverty is as widespread among Canadian Jews as it is among all other groups, according to Allan Moscovitch.

"Jewish poverty is similar to the pattern of poverty generally in Canada," Moscovitch, a professor and former dean of social work at Ottawa's Carleton University, told a national conference on Jewish poverty at the Asper Jewish Community Campus last month.

At the conference, attended by social workers, leaders of Jewish federations and other experts, Moscovitch, who has written or edited several books on poverty, cited figures from the 1996 Canadian census showing that 17 percent of Canadian Jews are poor, the same as for Canadians in general.

He and several other speakers at the two-day conference maintained that Canadian Jews have traditionally downplayed the extent of Jewish poverty in this country.

"There's a reluctance in the Jewish community to acknowledge poverty," he said in a follow-up interview, echoing a sentiment expressed at the conference.

"We like to believe we all live in homes with three-car garages, and at least one or two Mercedes in the driveway," said Rabbi Lindsey Bat Joseph, spiritual leader of Temple Beth Orah in Edmonton since 1996.

The vast majority of Canadian Jews don't fall into the ranks of the wealthy, Rabbi Bat Joseph said, adding that she had lived "below the poverty line, raising two children" for about a decade.

"We don't want to see poverty," Rabbi Bat Joseph said. "We point fingers at our government, and say it's somebody else's fault."

North American Jews don't like to acknowledge the poverty in their midst, because that contradicts their self-image, she added in a later interview.

"We like this image that we're well to do, that we're the immigrant community that made good. It's the North American dream – coming off the boat as poor immigrants, and doing well.

"I think there is a certain embarrassment about poverty," Rabbi Bat Joseph said. "We like to think that we take care of each other, because that's what our tradition teaches."

Mark Zarecki, executive director of Ottawa's Jewish family services agency, expressed similar views about Jewish communities' reluctance to accept the reality of Jewish poverty.

"We have in Jewish communities a misperception that all Jews are wealthy," he said.

As a result, the Jewish poor often consider themselves outsiders in their own communities.

"Among the poor, they're treated as Jews. Among the Jews, they're treated as poor."

Many tend to assimilate, partly because they're embarrassed about being poor, and it can be expensive to live Jewishly, he said.

"We have to show them the Jewish community can be inclusive," Zarecki said.

The Ottawa Jewish community has started a Tikvah Fund to help the city's Jewish poor, and a Jewish community "food bank" now has 600 clients a year, he reported.

Moscovitch said many experts define poverty in Canada, using a term called the low income cutoff (LICO).

"We measure how much people spend on food, clothing and shelter, and add 20 percent," he explained.

Moscovitch added, however, that the definition of poverty can vary widely, depending on who is studying it.

The Fraser Institute, a right-wing think tank, for example, defines the LICO as $19,517 for a family of four.

Toronto's Social Planning Council, the "most generous," defines it as "more than $40,000" for a family of four living in a large city.

The percentage of Canadian Jews living in poverty also varies widely from one region of the country to the next, Moscovitch said.

It is highest in Quebec, where it is estimated that 21.2 percent of the Jewish community is living in poverty. The Jewish poverty figure is 14.4 percent in the Atlantic provinces, 14.2 percent in Ontario, and averages 17.5 percent in the four Western provinces, he said.

Sandy Hyman, a Winnipeg social worker and president of Winnipeg's Jewish Child and Family Service, said only 13 percent of Winnipeg Jews fell into the poverty range in the last major Jewish population study here.

She acknowledged in a followup interview, however, that the statistics she was quoting were from 1995 Winnipeg Jewish community population study, based on 1991 and earlier Canadian census data.

Hyman said poverty in Winnipeg's Jewish community, as it is elsewhere, is particularly widespread among single-parent families, university students, the mentally challenged and people with long-term psychiatric problems.

Immigrants also make up a large percentage of Canada's Jewish poor, Moscovitch said. "Of the 59,000 [Canadian Jews] who are low-income, 24,000 are first-generation Canadians, 17,000 came to Canada in the last five to six years, and 12,000 came since 1980.

"Ten thousand of the 59,000" also have some kind of physical, mental, or psychiatric disability.

Greater numbers of women than men are in the ranks of the Jewish poor, and single Jewish men and women are more likely to be poor than married Jews, he said.

Linda Kislowicz, executive director of Jewish Family and Child Services in Montreal, said she and her counterparts across the country decided to hold this first national Jewish poverty conference to address issues that are of special concern to Canadian Jews.

"We felt there was a different set of issues" than for such agencies in the United States and "it merited a meeting.

'Great desire to learn, change'

"Each of the communities represented here has different policies and degrees of service. But there's a great desire to learn and change."

Koslowicz outlined what her agency does to help the poor in Montreal, where the Jewish community of about 100,000 is the second largest in Canada.

"We are never a primary source of income," she said of her agency. "We don't see ourselves as a first line of defence."

Her agency asks low-income Jewish Montrealers whether they've gone to their families and other sources for help first, she said.

When the agency does help them financially, it also often offers them other services to help them become more independent. Financial counselling is provided to teach clients to "use their money more effectively," and quality second-hand clothing is given to them so that they can dress well for job interviews, she said.

Maxine Finklestein, executive director of UIA-Federations Canada, which provides some funding to the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council and other federations, said it is important for conference participants to decide what happens next.

"The whole mission for klal Yisrael is responsibility for one another…We're mandated to fulfil this principle, in keeping with available resources," Finklestein said.

Funding is particularly helpful for Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, and for helping Jewish students at university campuses, she said.

Other Jewish community organizations can also pitch in to help the Jewish poor, Finklestein suggested.

"We don't know of any community that's ever gone broke by giving tickets to a community event…It's shameful that someone wasn't able to participate in a community event, because he couldn't afford to go."

CORRECTION

In last week's article about Toronto's Intersynagogue Kosher Food Bank, a number of lines were inadvertently omitted.

The last paragraph of the article's first column should have continued as follows:

Cash donations, used to purchase perishable items such as chickens (currently available at the northern location only), are also welcome.

Jewish agencies and other synagogues have been or are being notified that the food bank exists, so that they can make referrals.

Edghill hopes that food bank users can similarly be channeled to other organizations, so that they can become self-sufficient. "We're looking for ways to help," she said.

Evangelism can come from unexpected places

By SARAH FLOYD
Special to The CJN

Three members of the clergy representing Islam, Christianity and Judaism, recently came together at the University of Saskatchewan to discuss the historical and doctrinal aspects of each of their faiths.

The Jewish Students Association (JSA) co-sponsored the event with the Muslim Students Association (MSA). On the surface, this appeared to be an opportunity to learn and to create new understanding among the followers of the different faiths on campus. This is how I, as a member of the organizing committee, thought the event would play out.

I was a little uncertain about the motives of one of the groups, but felt that our committee would do our best to prevent misunderstandings and to make the evening successful.

There is only one Jewish student group on the U of S campus, as there is only one Muslim student group. As with most universities on the prairies, however, there are many different Christian student groups. When choosing someone to represent the Christian side of the interfaith dialogue, as this presentation was billed, the MSA invited Campus Crusade for Christ (CCC) to be the Christian representative.

I was somewhat concerned about this choice. According to some of the chaplains I spoke to on campus, evangelical activity is one aspect of the CCC mission statement. I was worried that the group's representative would use this opportunity to proselytize to a large audience that included many non-Christians.

As a Jewish campus professional, I am responsible for ensuring that the JSA is not associated with an event promoting a different religion. Understanding is important, but it should not be confused with any superiority statements. Many times in our discussions surrounding the organization of this event, I stressed that this was to be an opportunity for learning, not for proselytizing – I felt that this point was clear to everyone.

The evening of the event arrived. The committee met before it began to ensure all details were taken care of. The Jewish representative would speak first, followed by the Christian then the Muslim.

The Jewish speaker was eloquent in his presentation, giving a summary of the historical and doctrinal aspects of Judaism.

Next, the Christian speaker presented his perspective of Christianity. Although it came from an evangelical background, I felt in no way that he had attempted to proselytize from the stage. He simply stated how he felt, reiterating time and again that these were the teachings of his stream of Christianity. There were no superiority statements, as I had thought there would be.

Finally, the Muslim speaker had his turn. If I had listened between the lines to the language used in our pre-event planning, I might have been more prepared for what happened. Indeed, I could possibly have prevented it.

In the planning stages, it was decided that the order of the speakers would be Judaism, Christianity and Islam. Each would build on the other. I understood this to mean a historical development, not the steps in the development of one monotheistic religion. Apparently, this interpretation was not shared by all.

As the Muslim speaker began, it became clear that his intention was to proselytize, "proving" to both Jews and Christians alike that Islam was the only "true" religion, and that Judaism and Christianity had only existed to provide a basis for the development of true monotheism: Islam.

I was surprised. I have many Muslim and Christian friends, and I have only ever felt vulnerable to evangelism – if at all – with a few of the Christians. This was a new experience.

So what did I learn from this experience? Evangelism can come from unexpected places, and it is always good to be an active listener. This would allow me to separate people's spoken intentions from their unspoken ones.

The Jewish community on the prairies is small, and in some ways, we feel quite vulnerable to outside influences. While we have the same pioneer spirit as other Western Canadians do, we have the added concern of needing to nurture our own survival. An environment that promotes cross-cultural understanding is invaluable.

And so, while the program last month may not have provided this level of insight, it is important that we continue to dialogue with the other religious and ethnic groups in Western Canada, as well as in the rest of our country.

Sarah Floyd is the campus coordinator for the University of Saskatchewan's Jewish Students Association.

Jeffrey Spivock wins Israel Experience photo contest

TORONTO — Jeffrey Spivock of Montreal, a student at Ryerson Polytechnic University, is this year's winner of the Israel Experience photo contest.

More than 100 people attended the awards ceremony for the second annual contest, sponsored by the Canada Israel Experience Centre, The Canadian Jewish News, EL AL Israel Airlines, Roots Canada and UIA Federations Canada.

Spivock, who won an EL AL round trip ticket to Israel, thanked Charles Bronfman for his generous support of the Israel experience. He said that the trip to Israel had taught him tolerance for those with different political views and values, and that Bronfman's "investment in Jewish youth had already yielded significant interest."

The Andrea and Charles Bronfman philanthropies have been supporters of the Israel Experience over the last decade. Since 1997, Stephen Bronfman and Ellen Bronfman-Hauptman have contributed to Canadian Israel experience programs.

Jen Arron, a photography student at Ryerson, and winner of the 1998 photo contest, said that her summer in Israel "inspired her both spiritually and professionally."

Karen Morton, chair of Birthright Israel Canada, said that "the competition gave Canadian Jewish students an opportunity to express the best of their creative abilities in capturing their most evocative impressions of Israel."

Top 10 winners of the contest were Spivock, Michael Dacks, Michelle Astrug, Anna Stevenson, Idit Giterer, Carolyn Ruben, Deanna Rabinovitz, Jonathan Levinoff, Allison Friedman and Aaron Wenner.

Syrian leader Assad is finally ready to talk peace

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Syrian President Hafez al-Assad is a reluctant interview subject. So when he wants to speak to the world he uses proxies:

Analysis

the Syrian state media to communicate with the Arab world and British author and confidant Patrick Seale to communicate with the West.

It was through Seale that Assad warmly praised the newly elected Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak earlier this year, signalling that after more than three years since talks broke off, he was ready to talk peace again.

And it was through Seale again that he sent a message last Friday, after President Clinton's announcement about the resumption of talks in Washington, that "this is an important moment in the long, and often frustrating history of Middle East peacemaking."

"For the first time, three leaders – Clinton, Assad and Barak – are serious about making peace," Seale noted, echoing Assad's voice in the London-based daily, al-Hayat.

But despite reports that many details in the dispute between Israel and Syria have already been resolved, Seale added a veiled warning: "The success or failure of this enterprise will determine Israel's future relations with its neighbours. The stakes in the coming negotiations are very high indeed."

Both Barak and Clinton have their own, very different, reasons for concluding a deal with Syria, but the balance has shifted, and it is on Assad that history is pressing most heavily and most urgently.

What, if anything, has changed? Four factors have entered the equation that were not present when Syrian and Israeli negotiators met in 1996.

First, the health of Assad, 70, is reported to have seriously deteriorated – he is known to suffer from cardiovascular disease and is said to be battling leukemia and diabetes. According to some reports, he is able to work no more than two hours a day.

Second, there are growing doubts within presidential circles that his son and heir, Bashar, a former ophthalmologist, will be either willing or able to succeed him, despite years of grooming.

Third, Barak has pledged to withdraw – unilaterally, if necessary – from Israel's security zone in southern Lebanon by next July, which would undercut Assad's excuse for keeping some 40,000 troops in Lebanon, deprive him of his proxy war, via Hezbollah, against the Israeli presence, and thus remove a key negotiating card from his deck.

Fourth, Clinton's presidency is nearing its end, and Assad must calculate that the outgoing American president, with nothing to lose and much to gain, will be prepared to pressure Israel to make the concessions in order to crown his Middle East diplomatic efforts.

As Seale noted last Friday, "Clinton is anxious to end his second term with a spectacular foreign policy success that will enhance the record of his eight-year presidency and erase the memory of the shameful Monica Lewinsky affair."

Above all, a senior Arab political source said that as Assad's powers wane, his attention is focused almost obsessively on the succession and on his desperate, seemingly losing battle to promote Bashar.

Having witnessed the seamless transition of power when Jordan's young King Abdullah succeeded his late father, King Hussein, last February, Assad is now apparently banking on an alliance with Israel as a means of securing the Syrian succession for his son.

But it is uncertain whether Bashar has the natural authority or even the stomach for the job in a state where the cult of personality has been elevated to an art form.

There are constitutional obstacles to Bashar's succession. He is 35 years old, and the constitution says that the president must be at least 40.

Moreover, he holds no official position within either the ruling Ba'ath party or the government.

Even if those formidable, but largely technical, problems can be overcome, there are other more difficult hurdles in front of Bashar.

After intensive efforts to prepare him for the presidency since the premature death of his brother, Basel, in a mysterious car crash five years ago, Bashar has yet to win the respect of the military, political and economic power centres in Damascus.

Waiting in the wings with increasing impatience is Assad's 63-year-old brother, Rifa'at, a former Syrian vice-president who was exiled in 1986 after an abortive coup. Rifa'at still commands widespread support among the Assad family's minority Alawite sect in Syria.

Rifa'at, who is said to be enthusiastic for peace with Israel and to have held secret talks with Israeli officials, is so popular that Assad waited until February 1998 before formally stripping him of his post and expelling him from the party.

Those moves, however, failed to blunt his popularity.

After rounding up some 1,000 of his supporters in September, Assad's attempt to storm Rifa'at's Syrian stronghold in the Mediterranean port city of Latakia – a 13,692 square-yard compound, complete with its own port – was thwarted by members of Rifa'at's well-armed, well-trained private militia.

Last month, Assad launched a combined air, sea and ground operation and succeeded in overcoming Rifa'at's loyalists and destroying the compound in what was described as "a bloodbath."

Still, Rifa'at retains substantial support and remains a potent challenger for succession when Assad leaves the scene.

Assad made important concessions that permitted Clinton, when announcing the resumption of talks, to fudge the issue of just where negotiations had reached when they were broken off in 1996.

Perhaps for health reasons, however, Assad is continuing to refuse to meet the Israeli leader face to face during negotiations: "He will wait until agreement is reached on a full peace package before shaking hands with Barak on the White House lawn," Seale said.

That moment, say Israeli and Syrian officials, may now be just a matter of months away.

they left off in 1996. Clinton is due to open the summit between Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa.

Barak hailed the unprecedented political level of negotiations, saying it was what Israel had sought for years. With this, he did acknowledge that crises are ahead.

"The Syrians are champions of brinkmanship," Barak told the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot. He said he believes his own straight-talking manner played a part in Hafez al-Assad's decision to reopen the talks.

"Assad decided to resume negotiations after it was proven that what I say I will do, I do. I promised to advance negotiations with the Palestinians, and the negotiations moved forward," Barak said.

He added that Assad was also persuaded to resume negotiations by Barak's declared target date of July 2000 to pull Israeli troops out of Lebanon, where Syria is a main power broker.

Reports said the summit meeting, to be followed by intensive discussions in the region, will initially address technical matters regarding the format of the negotiations. The substantive issues on the negotiating agenda will include the final border, security arrangements including early-warning stations for Israel, control of water resources and the nature of peace-time relations, including diplomatic and commercial ties.

Barak speculated that negotiations with Lebanon could be positively influenced by the Syrian track, but would be held separately.

He also expressed confidence that a promised national referendum on a future Israeli-Syrian peace deal would receive overwhelming support.

Initial reaction from the Israeli opposition indicated otherwise.

"We will mobilize as many people [as needed] to oppose this," said Likud MK and former defence minister Moshe Arens. Arens and other opposition members charge Barak with capitulating to Syrian demands, including a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

Opposition leader Ariel Sharon said the Americans were informed that Barak was ready to withdraw to the 1967 borders. He accused Barak of pushing the talks with Syria in order to avert criticism of his social and economic failures.

"Barak failed and needs an 'achievement' to distance criticism," Sharon said in a Likud meeting, "and for this he is ready to give up the Golan Heights without anything in return, and to endanger Israel."

In light of the developments, the ties holding Barak's diverse coalition together showed some strain.

"I am concerned about this and truly hope there was no understanding regarding an Israeli withdrawal that enabled the resumption of talks," cabinet minister Yitzhak Levy, the head of the National Religious Party, told Israel Radio.

"The NRP remains committed to its opposition to giving up the Golan Heights or dismantling Jewish settlements there."

Some 18,000 Israeli Jews reside on the Golan Heights. Their reaction was mixed.

Yehuda Wolman, chair of the Golan regional council, said peace is impossible if it is based on the dismantling of Jewish settlements.

"My face is turned towards the battle to preserve the Golan," Wolman told Israel Radio.

However, Katzrin resident Yoav Tzur said Barak had laid out his objectives clearly in his election campaign, and however painful, peace with Syria carries a price.

"I have lived here for 21 years," he said. "I built my home here... If we make peace with Syria, then we have to pay a price. It's clear."

"We are praying for peace – a peace with the Golan," said Sammy Bar-Lev, head of the regional council of Katzrin, the Golan's largest town, with 6,500 residents.

"It must be a peace we can live with, not a Yamit-style peace," he adds, recalling the return of that Sinai settlement to Egypt in 1982, in which some Israeli settlers were forcefully evicted and the town was razed to the ground.

Later that year, Israel passed a bill that applied Israeli law and jurisdiction to the Golan. The international community never recognized the move, and the de facto annexation has provided the Golan's Jewish residents with little reassurance about their future.

Bar-Lev, a 30-year resident of the Golan, talked of years of uncertainty as successive governments debate the territory's fate. He is sure that the Israeli public will reject any agreement with Assad that involves the return of the Golan.

Slave-labour firms named

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — The American Jewish Committee has compiled the largest known list of German companies that used slave workers during the Nazi era.

The list, which contains 257 company names, is expected to put pressure on Germany and German firms negotiating a fund to compensate slave labourers.

The organization publicized the list last Tuesday – one day before the next round of negotiations was scheduled to resume in Washington.

Up to now, the longest list, with names of 80 companies, was compiled by a German group known as Action Reconciliation.

"History will not allow these firms to hide," said Eugene DuBow, outgoing director of the AJC's Berlin office.

Even the new list is far from final, according to a source close to the project.

Certain archives in Germany remain closed, but hopefully "we will blast them open," the source told JTA last Monday, a day before the new list was to be released.

The settlement negotiations have brought together representatives of Holocaust survivors, the German, U.S. and Eastern European governments, and some 50 German companies.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 6

• Israel will not close a new entrance to an important mosque in Jerusalem despite pressure to do so, said cabinet minister Haim Ramon. Ramon said the opening to Al-Aksa Mosque is necessary to ensure the safety of Muslim worshippers during the month of Ramadan. Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert had called for the entrance to be closed.

Dec. 7

• Israel's envoy in Amman warned that Jordanian silence over a censure of journalists who visited Israel could harm relations between the two countries. The Jordanian journalists were readmitted to a Jordanian press association only after they signed a statement saying they opposed normal relations with Israel.

Dec. 8

• Egypt and Israel are slated to open a diplomatic dialogue focusing on the new shape the Middle East will take after final peace agreements in the region are concluded, Ha'aretz reported. The director general of the Foreign Ministry, Eytan Bentsur met with his counterparts in Cairo to begin the talks.

Dec. 9

• The widow of Israeli spy Eli Cohen has asked to be included in Prime Minister Ehud Barak's entourage in talks with Syrian officials next week in Washington. Nadia Cohen said she hopes to make a personal plea to Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa to allow the return of her husband's remains to Israel as a goodwill gesture.

• Israel launched a diplomatic push to convince Thai authorities not to execute two Israeli citizens convicted of dealing drugs.

Dec. 10

• Two Hezbollah gunmen were killed and an IDF soldier was lightly hurt in one of the heaviest days of fighting in south Lebanon in several weeks. The fierce exchange came soon after the announcement that peace talks between Syria and Israel would resume next week in Washington.

Saga of Swiss accounts comes to inconclusive end

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The saga of dormant Holocaust-era accounts in Swiss banks has come to a somewhat inconclusive end.

After hundreds of auditors pored over bank records for three years, a panel overseeing the massive research effort identified nearly 54,000 accounts that may have belonged to victims of the Nazis. It said that the names on about half of them should be published in an effort to find the owners or their rightful heirs.

But there were many more accounts with so little documentation that the teams of researchers were undecided.

The "whole story" of the panel's work is "what we didn't find," Israel Singer, secretary general of the World Jewish Congress and an alternate on the panel, was quoted as saying Dec. 6, the day the report was released.

He was referring to two million accounts opened between 1933 and 1945 that lacked almost all traces of documentation.

It will never be known how many of them had been opened by Jews who believed that Swiss banks would provide a safe haven for their funds during the Nazi era.

In its report, the panel found several instances in which individual banks destroyed records pertinent to the investigation. As a result of these findings, Swiss police have begun a criminal probe that may target the banks involved, JTA has learned.

The panel, formally known as the Independent Committee of Eminent Persons and headed by former U.S. Federal Reserve chair Paul Volcker, was created by the World Jewish Restitution Organization and the Swiss Bankers Association in May 1996 to investigate the dormant accounts.

Jewish groups accused the Swiss banks more than four years ago of hoarding the wealth of Holocaust victims.

The accusation not only tarnished Switzerland's long-cherished reputation as a neutral country during the war; it also mushroomed into a hunt for Jewish assets from the Holocaust and Nazi-looted gold that is still in many western European nations, the United States, Brazil and Argentina.

Analysis

The Volcker Commission's report lent credence – based on documentation it found in the records of several unnamed Swiss banks – to long-standing charges that the banks turned a deaf ear to the needs of Jewish depositors while responding to the directives issued by officials in Nazi Germany.

In addition, the total number of accounts described in the panel's report far exceeds initial estimates presented by the Swiss banks: In testimony three years ago before a U.S. congressional panel, Swiss Bankers Association representatives said they could only locate 775 accounts worth about $32 million (US).

Perhaps the most important conclusion of the panel is that it saw no reason to revise the $1.25-billion settlement that Swiss banks agreed on last year, to pay Holocaust-era claims.

This provided some relief for Swiss bankers. They had feared that the commission's findings could jeopardize the settlement, which was meant to put an end to what many have seen as the darkest chapter in modern Swiss history.

Holocaust victims or their heirs with valid claims to the dormant accounts will be the first to receive moneys from that settlement. Had the commission estimated that their claims would exceed the $1.25 billion, all bets might have been off.

Although that will not be the case, the newly discovered dormant accounts unearthed by the Volcker panel may influence Judge Edward Korman, who is overseeing the settlement in a New York court, to delay the date when the court-appointed official, Judah Gribetz, issues his recommendations on how the settlement is to be distributed.

Gribetz is currently slated to make that recommendation Dec. 28, but the date reportedly may have to be pushed back to allow time to factor in the Volcker panel's findings.

In the past three years, the Volcker panel employed some 650 auditors at a cost of about $300 million to comb through the records of 59 Swiss banks.

The commission, which included three Jewish representatives and two alternates, and an equal number of representatives approved by the Swiss Bankers Association, painted a mixed picture of the banks' activities, saying on the one hand that it found "no evidence of systematic destruction" of records.

But the report also said it had "confirmed evidence of questionable and deceitful actions by some individual banks" in handling the accounts of Holocaust victims.

The report recommended waiving Swiss banking secrecy laws to publish the names of 25,187 dormant accounts. There was not sufficient information about the remainder of the 54,000 accounts it located to merit their publication.

It remains unclear whether Swiss bankers will follow the panel's recommendation and publish the 25,187 names. Kurt Hauri, the head of the Swiss Federal Banking Commission, would not speculate on whether the names would be published. He said the body would make the decision early next year.

In 1997, two separate lists were published that included some 16,000 names linked to dormant accounts worth about $54.4 million.

Swiss bankers, not surprisingly, were pleased that the commission found no proof that they had systematically destroyed records.

Georg Krayer, president of the Swiss Bankers Association, has apologized "for all the disappointments and hurt feelings" caused by the banks' "insufficient" knowledge about the sufferings of Holocaust victims before the controversy erupted four years ago.

But at the same time, he said, "with the exception of a few isolated cases, the banks' conduct during the period in question was correct."

Jewish leaders, however, had a different view of the panel's findings.

"It is a devastating report," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the WJC. "It confirms the fears of Holocaust survivors and validates their testimony of 50 years, and it is replete with examples of misconduct on the part of the banks."

In Jerusalem, Avner Shalev, chair of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial – which provided the names of millions of Holocaust victims to the panel so that it could match the names against dormant accounts – said the Volcker Commission had "brought a bit of justice into the open, into the light."

In addition to the Volcker panel's report, the Swiss people will soon have to contend with a second report on the nation's wartime past.

That report, drafted by an international panel of historians known as the Bergier Commission, will focus on Switzerland's treatment of Jewish refugees during World War II.

It is expected to contain a stinging rebuke of the Alpine nation's wartime policy toward the refugees.

Last week, Swiss Jewish leaders met with government officials to discuss a possible anti-Semitic backlash in the wake of the Bergier panel's report.

In the meantime, Orthodox families in Zurich say they are afraid to go out alone because of possible attacks.

"We are advising our members to go out in groups of at least two or more," one representative of the community, speaking on condition of anonymity, told JTA.

JTA correspondent Fredy Rom in Zurich contributed to this report.

Women's equality focus of talk by Rosalie Abella

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Justice Rosalie Abella spoke recently at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem on Equality: Human Rights for Women.

"It's an exciting time to come here," said Abella, who is a judge on the Ontario Court of Appeal.

Abella spent her week in Israel lecturing to judges across the country, speaking to the Women's Committee in the Knesset, and talking to law students.

Abella divided her talk at the university into three main issues: equality, human rights, and the role of the courts.

Abella explained how Israel's Basic Law borrows concepts from the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. "We've had [more than] 10 years of experience," Abella pointed out.

"There is a resonance in concerns we [Canadians and Israelis] share," said Abella.

Abella's lecture was given as the first Bullock lecture. The Bullock chair was set up by the Hebrew University for a scholar to deliver an annual lecture or seminar.

Abella, who has been to Israel a number of times, also praised the Knesset Status of Women Committee and said, "they've done a lot and will probably do a whole lot more."

Asked for her impression on equality in Israel, Abella said she believes "there's a strong group of people who are determined that there are equal rights for women."

However, the Association for Civil Rights in Israel said in a recent report that women are still discriminated against in the workplace.

Almost 14 percent of working women earn less than the minimum wage, compared to five percent of working men, ACRI said in its report marking the beginning of International Human Rights Week.

In the research, which covered employment, education, and criminal affairs, ACRI found that discrimination in these fields is "an accepted and deeply rooted norm."

The report, its authors wrote, "presents a harsh picture of the dimensions of discrimination. Even though in the declarative sphere Israel supports the principle of equality, and despite a series of laws that bans discrimination, the reality is extremely grim."

Not only do a larger proportion of women than men earn less than the minimum wage, but the percentage of unemployed women is higher than that of unemployed men.

While more women attend university than men, only 22 percent of senior faculty and 7.8 percent of full professors are female.

The report found that 13.62 percent of women employees earn less than minimum wage, compared to 5.01 percent of men, and that only 35 percent of the job retraining budget went to women.

Nahum Ido, the Labour and Social Affairs Ministry spokesperson, denied that women are discriminated against in funding for job retraining courses.

Ido denied that the ministry allocates less job retraining funding to women than men. Women constitute almost 50 percent of these courses and the ministry has a special fund for women to encourage them to participate, he said.

New war crimes act introduced

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — A new Canadian Crimes Against Humanity Act, if passed, will revive the option of criminal prosecutions against war crimes suspects and crimes against humanity suspects.

The legislation was tabled last Friday, International Human Rights Day, by Lloyd Axworthy, foreign affairs minister, and Anne McLellan, minister of justice and attorney general of Canada.

"I am proud that Canada is the first country to introduce such comprehensive implementation legislation," said Axworthy, referring to the International Criminal Court established last year to deal with serious international crimes.

"In doing so, we are…ensuring that Canada is at the forefront of making the International Criminal Court a vital, functioning entity."

The act, which would replace the current war crimes provisions of the Criminal Code, would create new offences of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and breach of responsibility by military commanders and civilian superiors.

"The government of Canada remains committed to using all available avenues to bring to justice persons suspected of committing genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes," said McLellan.

The amendments would "reaffirm Canada's pledge to Canadians and to the international community that Canada is not, and will not be, a safe haven for war criminals," she added.

Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the news. "While we need time to examine the specific details of the bill carefully," said CJC president Moshe Ronen, "we endorse in principle the government's initiative to re-establish the viability of the criminal prosecution route to deal with war crimes and crimes against humanity cases in Canada."

Criminal prosecution in such cases came to a halt after the Supreme Court of Canada's 1994 acquittal of former Toronto restaurateur Imre Finta, the first person charged under federal war crimes legislation.

More details next week.

New drug helps treat Alzheimer's patients

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The new drug Aricept (donepezil) is of "modest benefit" in treating patients with mild to moderate Alzheimer's disease, Dr. Shelley Sternberg recently told the 20th Dr. Ira Pollock Clinic Day at Wagman Centre.

An enhancement of cognition results from treatment with this drug, and it seems to delay the progression of the disease for about six months, said Sternberg, assistant professor of medicine at University of Chicago and a former Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care staffer.

Experience with the drug at Baycrest over a two-year period suggests that the disease is actually held back for about a year, said Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of medical services at Baycrest who chaired the meeting.

Sternberg said, however, that patients taking Aricept must be watched for possible agitation and for drug interactions.

She said administration of Aricept raises many ethical problems, including when to stop the drug, since there is still uncertainty about how long it may arrest the disease.

"There are no guidelines on when to stop. I think that after six months a decision should be made," she said.

In response to Sternberg's paper, Gordon said families are reluctant to stop the drug, but he added: "We've put the drug on hold. It seems to hold out benefit, but there are things about its long-term use we don't know."

In his own lecture following Sternberg's, Gordon discussed the issues involved in telling patients they are suffering from Alzheimer's disease. Even the question of whether to tell them is a tricky one, he said, but concluded that most patients should be told of the diagnosis.

When they are told, however, it can be difficult. "Once or twice a month I hear from families who are concerned about what I may say to the patient. I had a woman stomp out of the office saying her daughter had misled her about the reason for the visit," he said.

Hadassah medical projects

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hadassah WIZO of Canada has announced that its newest medical projects include a comprehensive breast clinic at Assaf Harofe Medical Centre and an artificial heart program at Hadassah Hospital.

Patricia Alpert, national past president of the organization, who presented the projects at the recent 36th national convention held in Ottawa, said that they feel great affinity to the breast cancer project.

"This is something we will support with our hearts and souls."

Assaf Harofe has been trying for several years, she said, to create a multi-disciplinary medical facility for women with breast cancer. Planned, is a facility that will bring together diagnosticians, surgeons, oncologists, plastic surgeons, psychologists, social workers and other medical consultants.

The Hadassah Hospital project, she said, involves inserting a left ventricular assist device (LVAD), an artificial heart pump, which can be an interim solution for patients waiting for heart transplants, and in some instances, for long-term maintenance.

In some patients, she said, recovery of heart function was observed following the use of the LVAD, even to the extent of being able to remove it without a subsequent heart transplant.

A highlight of the convention, in which Marion Mayman of Ottawa was elected president, was the presentation of a humanitarian award to Hiroki Sugihara, in honour of his late father Chiune, consul general, Japan for Lithuania during World War II. By issuing visas, he rescued over 6,000 Lithuanian Jews.

At the presentation, Hiroki Sugihara met Alan Marshall, the grandson of someone to which his father had issued a visa. "Because of [Chiune], there is life," Marshall said.

Also at the convention, Herb Gray, deputy prime minister of Canada was presented with the Canadian Award, and Ronald Lauder, chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations received the Rebecca Sieff Award.

HEART OF GOLD: Dick and Dora Bromstein (centre), volunteers for Leukemia Research Fund Canada, receive enthusiastic applause as the Heart of Gold awardees at the awards evening. The award is given to volunteers who give their time and effort to help the organization.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Can you tell me a few non-meat sources of iron?
A. Try kidney beans, cream of wheat cereal and raisin bran muffins made with molasses. Raisins and molasses are both good sources of iron.
Q. My children love to snack on nuts after school. Is this a healthy snack?
A. Nuts are a very healthful snack. They are rich in protein and heart healthy monounsaturated fats as well as fibre. Nuts do, however, contain a lot of total fat and calories, so watch the portion sizes. And be careful not to offer whole nuts to young children who can easily choke on them.
Q. I am looking for some treats and desserts to make for my kids that are healthier than traditional cookies and snack foods. What baked goods can you suggest?
A. Try Rice Krispie squares, oatmeal cookies, chocolate chip bran muffins, banana nut bread, carrot muffins, date squares and granola bars.

Starring in Istvan Szabo's Sunshine are (from left) James Frain, Jennifer Ehle and Ralph Fiennes.

Director's pacing never falters in epic Genie-nominated movie

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sunshine is one of those vast, sweeping inter-generational family sagas which draws in audiences by virtue of its compelling story line, its sumptuous production values and its generally convincing performances.

Although three hours in length, it is rarely boring. This, first and foremost, is a tribute to director Istvan Szabo, whose grasp of the material and whose pacing never falters.

Playing at Cineplex Odeon theatres starting on Dec. 17, Sunshine unfolds across a span of three generations – from the Habsburg Empire to the present day – and leaves a viewer with a distinct message: you cannot escape your roots.

The film, co-produced by Canadian Robert Lantos, is set in Hungary, and revolves around the wealthy and assured Sonnenscheins, whose calm, sedate existence is torn asunder by love, war, tribal nationalism and anti-Semitism. Shot on location in Europe, it begins with a big bang and ends with a measure of personal redemption.

Formerly tavern keepers, the Sonnenscheins have grown rich as distillers of a popular herbal beverage. The clan is headed by Emmanuel (David de Keyser) and his wife, Rose (Miriam Margolyes). They are traditional Jews who place their hopes in their smart, ambitious son, Ignatz (Ralph Fiennes).

Ignatz, however, has no interest in the family business. A conformist lawyer in the civil service, he aspires to a judgeship, knowing full well that his Jewishness is a disadvantage on the greasy pole of success.

Accommodating himself to the racism of the times, he changes his surname to Sors, which is considered "more Hungarian." His brother, Gustave (James Frain), travels a different road as a left-wing revolutionary. Gustave warns Ignatz that he will never really be accepted as a Hungarian, but he dismisses the observation.

Spice is added to brew when Ignatz falls afoul of his parents' wishes and pursues his alluring first cousin, Valerie (Jennifer Ehle). The wedding takes place in a beautifully photographed ceremony in Budapest's main synagogue. Eventually, their seemingly perfect marriage crumbles.

The second part of Sunshine, whose dramatic appeal is supplemented by historical file footage of Hungary's descent into World War I and then into fascism, is dominated by Ignatz's handsome, dashing son, Adam. He is also portrayed by Fiennes.

A champion fencer, Adam takes his family's penchant for assimilation one step further by converting to Christianity. He does so to advance his promising athletic career. His wife, Hannah (Molly Parker), is a Jewish convert as well.

As a person, Adam is a snob and maybe even an anti-Semite, but as a sportsman, he is superb. In a scintillating scene at the 1936 Berlin Olympics, which is shot against the backdrop of a gigantic swastika, he wins the gold medal in a furiously fought match.

Despite his fame, Adam finds himself excluded on racial grounds from an army officers' club. But, being naive, he blithely ignores this snub and the passage of a major anti-Semitic law subjecting Jews to second-class citizenship. An unblinking patriot, he believes that these bad times will pass. As darkness descends on Hungary, he has an affair with his brother's wife (Rachel Weisz), an episode which hardly advances the plot.

Hungarian Jews

The fate Adam ultimately meets, in a Hungarian labour camp on a freezing winter day, is simply excruciating. Symbolic of civilization's thin veneer, his demise is a distillation of the horrors which occurred during the Holocaust. Szabo directs the scene with tact and a great deal of artistry.

Ivan, Adam's son, played by Fiennes yet again, joins the postwar Communist government's secret police force. By doing so, he thinks that he can exact vengeance on his father's murderers. But Ivan quickly discovers that the new regime, though anti-fascist, is ideologically changeable and anything but philo-Semitic.

In short order, the government unmasks a supposedly anti-Zionist conspiracy. Adam's superior, a general whose wife Adam is bedding on the side, warns him "to keep Jews off your team."

Thoroughly disillusioned with the Communists, Adam breaks ranks with them, suffering the consequences of his heresy. With the dissolution of the Communist era, he embraces his Jewish identity, changing his name back to Sonnenschein and, as he puts it, breathes freely at last.

Though occasionally didactic, Sunshine radiates seriousness of purpose and wide-ranging intelligence. Definitely not a coarse, garden variety soap opera, this film is imbued with a steadfast moral compass which rarely leads it astray.

The script, co-written by Szabo and Israel Horowitz, moves things along nicely, but suffers from pat phrasing here and there.

Fiennes, a remarkable actor, has no trouble carrying the picture from one generation to the next. His co-stars, particularly Ehle, Rosemary Harris (the elderly Valerie), William Hurt (a Communist police official) and de Keyser, acquit themselves with aplomb.

Sunshine, which can be enjoyed and appreciated on different levels, is the ideal movie to usher out the 20th century, the most destructive in history.

Last week, it was nominated for 14 Genie Awards, more than any other film.

ARCHITECT CHARMS WITH KIDS' STORIES

David Reich, architect and "zayde emeritus" from Montreal, has written and illustrated Once Upon A Time Long Ago, a charming book of children's stories which he self-published.

The 10 stories in the softcover collection are meant "for children from three to 90," who are advised that they can at least colour the pictures if they don't like the stories. But after reading a few of the tales, including The Schlepper And The Donkey and The Truth About Ruth Rottentooth of Duluth, I have to ask: "What's not to like?"

Reich says he first wrote the book for his grandchildren, who "have given it favourable reviews."

The book's first printing was entirely sold out – "all 10 copies" – at the recent Jewish Book Fair in Toronto. No doubt the author's lively imagination, inventive way with words, and sense of humour had something to do with its initial success.

Once Upon A Time Long Ago is available for $9.95 at Educa-jeux, 1257 University St., Montreal, or by mail for $9.99 (includes shipping and handling). 514-486-3166. E-mail, reich@sympatico.ca.

Inside the Broadway Musical: One sleepless night in 1926, American composer George Gershwin read a novel, Porgy, and wrote author Dubose Heyward for permission to turn it into an opera. It took seven years before the two started working on the project in earnest. They were perhaps spurred into action because an independent producer was attempting another version of the work, featuring the lyrics and music of Show Boat collaborators Oscar Hammerstein and Jerome Kern, and starring Al Jolson in blackface.

When Porgy and Bess finally premiered in 1935, the New York Times sent two reviewers to the opening, uncertain whether the production was a dramatic work or a musical. While the former critic was enthusiastic, the music critic had mixed feelings, writing that "the style is at one moment of opera and another of operetta or sheer Broadway entertainment."

That's just one of many important evolutionary moments of the Broadway musical highlighted in Enchanted Evenings: The Broadway Musical from Show Boat to Sondheim, by Geoffrey Block. The book is an engaging, well-researched discussion of 14 seminal works including Anything Goes, Pal Joey, Carousel, Kiss Me Kate, Guys and Dolls, My Fair Lady and West Side Story.

There's also a chapter on The Cradle Will Rock, the 1937 "labour musical" that has recently been revived as both a Jason Sherman play and a new movie.

Serious fans of the Broadway musical, including professional musicians, will find this a compelling read. Oxford Press, $56.

Author's stories centre on Orthodox people

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

TORONTO — On the top floor of a downtown book store all eyes are riveted on the young man with dark flowing locks reading at the podium.

From his attire – jeans, worn boots and a casual brown sweater – the young man, Nathan Englander, looks like a graduate student. But he is, in fact, a best-selling author.

Englander's first book, For the Relief of Unbearable Urges (Knopf), a collection of short stories published in March, has been showing up on many best book of the year lists.

All the stories in this collection have a Jewish theme, and many centre on Orthodox protagonists. It is a subject the Jerusalem-based Englander, 29, is familiar with, having grown up in a haredi community in Long Island, N.Y. Today, however, he writes from the vantage point of a secular Jew.

Some 150 people attend the reading he gives in Toronto, which has been organized by the New Leadership Division of the Toronto Chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Englander is on the last leg of a promotional tour in North America. He has been on the road for six months.

On this night in Toronto he reads from the book's title story, For the Relief of Unbearable Urges, about a chassidic man who is given dispensation by his rebbe to see a prostitute because he has been spurned sexually by his wife.

In The Gilgul of Park Avenue, a Protestant man has a revelation that he has a Jewish soul – an Orthodox Jewish soul – while riding in a taxi. He gradually incorporates Jewish ritual into his life, much to the incredulity of his wife.

The book deals with issues of identity, Englander tells the audience during the question and answer period.

He recounts the transition in his identity from Orthodox to secular Jew. It happened in Israel, where, he says, he saw secular Jews strongly identifying as Jewish.

The way he was raised, people who were not religious were not considered Jewish, he says. "I was raised not to respect secular Judaism. In Israel I discovered I could be both."

Englander was a student at State University of New York at Binghamton and did his junior year at the Rothberg International School at Hebrew University in 1989-90. During his very first week in Israel, he says, he became a secular Jew. "I got into a car on Shabbat."

But Englander says the move away from the Orthodox world in which he was raised took years, explaining that as a teenager he had questioned the lifestyle and found refuge in literature and writing.

He went away to university, a move that was frowned upon in his community, he says. "I was edging out of religiosity for years. In Israel, I could bridge that gap."

After completing university, he worked as a photographer in New York City. He continued to write and went on to study at the University of Iowa's Writer's Workshop.

In Iowa, he began selling his short stories to magazines, and he was discovered by a literary agent who found him a publisher.

In response to a query about why he continues to write about about the Orthodox community, Englander says that although he's no longer religious, he spent two-thirds of his life in that community.

"This is my world. I grew up in it. Even if I wasn't from that world, you write about whatever your topic is."

As for his family's response to the changes he has made, Englander says his family and the community he grew up in have been very supportive. "I respect their world and they respect mine."

His family is proud of his success, he add. "They're schepping nachas."

New children's Jewish choir debuts in concert at Leah Posluns theatre

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

A new Jewish children's choir presented its premiere performance just eight weeks after its creation.

The Renanim Children's Chorus recently sang with Lachan – the Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, and with Cantilena, a Toronto-based professional vocal ensemble.

The three choirs were part of A Holiday Celebration of Song, presented by the Koffler Centre of the Arts at the Leah Posluns theatre.

The Lachan choir was conducted by Cantor Benjamin Z. Maissner, and Cantilena was conducted by Wayne Gilpin.

Susan Michaels, conductor and founder of Renanim, said that when she was contacted by the Koffler School of Music to establish the choir, she was excited about being able to provide children from the entire religious spectrum of the Jewish community with the opportunity to sing together.

While there are choirs in some of the synagogues and day schools, she said, the children are separated by their religious affiliations.

Renanim unites Jewish children from different Hebrew day schools, other private schools and public schools, Michaels said.

After eight weeks of hard work, Michaels said, Chanukah seemed like the perfect time to bring the children's voices to the public.

Choir debuts for Chanukah show

Michaels, who was a high school educator, sang with the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir for about 17 years. At the same time, she was also involved in community work. She was vice-president of Jewish Women's Federation for four years.

Michaels said she decided to form the choir in order to combine her Jewish world with her non-Jewish world.

"When I sang with the Mendelssohn, I felt that I was a part of a magnificent choir. But at the same time, singing Christian music made me feel like an outsider.

"Renanim allowed me to bring our rich Jewish heritage to our kids, and at the same time have them belong to a musical group they could be proud of.

"Hopefully," Michaels said, "I'll be able to teach the kids to love who they are through an appreciation of their music."

In A Holiday Celebration of Song, Michaels said, "it was wonderful to conduct the Renanim choir with the Lachan choir in a rendition of Ocho Kandelikas, a Ladino song.

"It gave me the opportunity to bring together Jewish voices of all different ages and backgrounds."

The choir is currently made up of about 25 children, ranging in age from seven to 16, singing in three parts – first soprano, second soprano and alto.

Michaels said she hopes that as the choir grows, she will be able to divide the kids into younger and older groups.

"Not only is there so much music written for this time of year," Michaels said, "but Chanukah is a great time to illuminate the fact that we can all come together despite our religious observances through the unity of song."

Transformed Croatian town blessed with Mediterranean-like climate

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

OPATIJA, Croatia — This charming, sedate town on the Adriatic Sea has undergone two major transformations in the last few hundred years.

For a long time, it was an obscure fishing village dependent on the bounty of the Bay of Kvarner.

In the 19th and early 20th centuries, it was the haunt of European royalty and a pantheon of writers and musicians.

For the past several decades, Opatija, with a population of 10,000, has been an affordable resort for the working and middle classes.

It is not hard to understand why Opatija, some 200 kilometres east of Venice, Italy, is a draw.

When it is freezing in Zagreb, the capital of Croatia, the weather here is usually balmy. Opatija is blessed with a Mediterranean climate. On average, the winter temperature is 10 C, with snow being a rarity. In summer, the mean temperature is 22 degrees.

Mt. Ucka rises 1,396 metres over Opatija, the highest point in the Istrian peninsula, protecting it from the cold, strong bura wind.

The coastline, encompassing Croatia's riviera, is curvaceous and stunning, dotted with palm trees, cypresses and ginkgos. The semi-tropical landscape is such that if you were parachuted into Opatija, you might not know you were in the heart of Europe.

As a result of certain currents, the water of the Adriatic is crystal clear, far clearer than the Mediterranean Sea.

You can swim in the Adriatic for much of the year, although the beaches are on the rocky side. The only sand beach is 100 kilometres from Opatija, on the island of Susak.

Croatia has more than 1,000 offshore islands, 66 of them inhabited. All of them are said to be as pretty as the Greek islands further to the south.

Two of the largest ones, Krk and Cres, are relatively close to Opatija. You can see them, green and mountainous, as you walk the length of Opatija's elegant 12-kilometre waterfront promenade.

Opatija is justly famous for its ornate, pastel-coloured Italianate villas, a legacy of its tumultuous past.

Administered by the Austro-Hungarian Empire until 1918, Opatija was subsequently ruled by Italy. It passed into Yugoslavia's hands in 1946. Since 1991, Opatija has been part of newly sovereign Croatia.

During the strife which tore Yugoslavia to shreds in the early and mid-1990s, this region was luckily spared.

Nevertheless, the secessionist wars that carved up Yugoslavia into separate independent states drove travellers away, and tourism is still off by at least 40 percent. Tourists, however, are slowly returning, not only to Opatija, but to neighbouring Lovran, five kilometres down the coast.

Hemmed in by pine, oak, bay and chestnut forests, as well as olive and lemon groves, Lovran is an attractive town of 5,000 inhabitants.

During the Roman era, it was a summer residence of nobility. Later, Lovran was a busy port that often fended off pirate attacks.

Like Opatija, Lovran is known for its beautiful villas, and one of them, Villa Frappart, set in a spacious but somewhat neglected garden, has become a music academy which doubles as a hotel.

The star attraction of Lovran is the medieval quarter. Its narrow streets and compact houses are quite impressive, and its cafes and boutiques exude a charm of their own.

Deadline for peace deal draft set

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinian Authority plan to complete a first draft of the framework for a permanent agreement within the next four weeks.

The two sides made the decision in talks held last week by U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright with Prime Minister Ehud Barak and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat.

At the same time, a senior Israeli source said yesterday that the Palestinians were slowing down the pace of negotiations on the permanent agreement in order to wait for developments on the Syrian track.

The source said the Palestinians hope to be able to take advantage of two precedents that will be set in the Israel-Syrian treaty: a withdrawal to the June 4, 1967, lines and the evacuation of all the settlements on the Golan – two demands that Israel is ready to accept from the Syrians but not from the Palestinians in terms of equivalent features in the West Bank.

Barak and Arafat spoke by telephone last weekend after the prime minister sent the Palestinian leader condolences on the death of his eldest sister, who died on Saturday. During the conversation, which Israeli sources described as positive, the two leaders exchanged family experiences and spoke about their genetic makeup and its effect on their life span.

A planned meeting between the two men is not expected to take place until after Barak's return from talks with the Syrians in Washington, because Barak was suffering from flu and Arafat was visiting Egypt.

Albright offered Barak and Arafat a format for continuing the talks on the framework agreement, to enable progress to be made and create the possibility of a summit meeting of the two leaders with President Bill Clinton. The main points are as follows:

- The sides will complete a first draft of the framework agreement by Jan 10, 2000.
- Arafat will be invited to a meeting with Clinton in Washington.
- U.S. peace envoy Dennis Ross will visit the Middle East on Jan. 15 and will be involved in the talks continuously until the summit meeting.
- Albright will return for another visit in late January, in which she will assess the progress made in the talks and then make a recommendation to Clinton on whether to convene a summit meeting.

Searching for professional Jewish hockey players

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

Finding Jewish pro and semi-pro hockey players is sometimes a challenge; at other times, it's a piece of honey cake.

In the case of San Jose right-winger Ronnie Stern, 32, you don't exactly have to be a detective to search for clues as to his whereabouts. He can usually be found in any of the 28 National Hockey League penalty boxes from Florida to California.

Behaving like a shark in the team's second game of the season, the Ste. Agathe, Que., native started slowly with an interference penalty in the first period. In the second, he received a double roughing penalty, a high-sticking infraction and a fighting major. So, what did you expect? A hat trick?

The 6-foot, 195-pound Stern only scored a total of seven goals and nine assists last year, but that's not what the pugnacious skater, who missed the entire 1997-98 season with a knee injury, was hired for. A team-leading 158 minutes in penalties underscores his job description.

Next month, Stern will reach the 600 game mark in the NHL and one can only wonder how much tread remains on his tires.

Who knows, perhaps he'll hang around for his second captaincy with the Maccabiah Games' Canadian hockey squad.

New York Rangers defenceman Mathieu Schneider, whose dad is Jewish, is back in the NHL for his 12th season. He was recently re-signed as a free agent to a one-year $2.75-million pact.

The 30-year-old earned the same fee last season when he ranked second to star rearguard Brian Leetch in blue-liner scoring, with 10 goals and 24 assists in 75 games. The one-year agreement enables the New York native to become an unrestricted free agent next season.

This being the case he will likely pull down the kind of numbers in his next contract that will make his present agreement seem like change.

Schneider, who led his team in hits last season with 182, was acquired from the Maple Leafs in exchange for rearguard Alexander Karpovtsev a week after the start of last season.

Mathieu was a member of Montreal's 1993 Stanley Cup-winning team and also played for the United States in the 1998 Olympics and the 1996 World Cup.

The 5-foot-10, 192-pounder has totalled 105 goals and 240 assists in 628 career NHL games with the Rangers, Leafs, Islanders and Canadiens.

Steve Dubinsky, a centre, is still hanging on with the Calgary Flames in his second campaign with the team. His stats tell the whole story, as far as his role with the Alberta club is concerned. He played in 62 games last season (one with the Blackhawks) and managed only four goals and 10 assists as a defensive forward primarily.

The 29-year-old Montreal native was a walk-on at Clarkson University. When the powers that be noted his potential, they granted him a scholarship in his last three years. It is noteworthy that Dubinsky was a bit of a sniper in the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Association, recording 58 goals and adding 90 assists in 141 games.

Dubinsky said three years ago when he was with Chicago that people did make a big deal about his being a rare Jewish pro hockey player and that it helped him to integrate into the Jewish community.

Fresh blood is also important, and I have located a new Jewish NHLer with the Washington Capitals. Jeff Halpern, 23, is a centre with the club and on Oct. 19, he potted his first goal.

He is considered by some as a skater who has lots to learn as he makes adjustments from U.S. college hockey to the NHL, but he's fast, smart, and listens well.

The Potomac, Md., native was an outstanding player with Division 1 Princeton and played six games last season with Portland Pirates, the American Hockey League affiliate of the Caps. He scored a pair of goals and added an assist. His making the parent team so soon surprised more than a few observers.

Mathieu Schneider

On the cusp are a fair number of Jewish players who aspire to playing under the big top.

Last year, left-winger Doug Friedman had 26 goals and 25 assists with the International Hockey League Milwaukee Admirals and this season he is with San Jose's farm team, Kentucky, in the AHL.

David Hymovitz, also a left winger, who led the IHL Indianapolis Ice in scoring last season (46 goals, 30 assists) is in the Los Angeles chain now and skating with Lowell of the AHL.

The AHL St. John's Maple Leafs boast two Jewish skaters in right winger David Nemirovsky and centre Aaron Brand. The former had 25 goals and 22 helpers with two clubs last year, and the latter scored seven goals and had 26 assists with the Maple Leafs farm team.

Todd Simon, centre, is back with the IHL Cincinnati Cyclones where he was 26 and 61 last season.

In Milwaukee, you'll also find Nashville defenceman Bubba Berenszweig.

The Edmonton Oilers' first round pick of two years ago, Michael Henrich, is back for seasoning with Barrie of the Ontario League.

Other minor leaguers out there are Oleg Shargorodsky, David Littman, Jamie Sokolsky, Brandon Gray, Harold Hersh, and Andy Silverman.

The search continues...

סיפור חיים: אהרן אפלפלד

כאשר נודע לראשונה שאהרן אפלפלד פרסם את קורות חייו הייתי בין אלו שעבורם זו הייתה אמורה להיות הפתעה מרהיבה. כבוד הסופר אהרן אפלפלד מגולל, בלשון ישירה, פרקים מתולדות חייו. לאור חשיבותו של אפלפלד כסופר היה ספרו אמור לשמש כמסמך תרבותי חשוב ביותר במאה שלנו.

מה רבה הייתה אכזבתי עם קריאת סיפור חיים של אהרן אפלפלד, הוצאת כתר. בראש ובראשונה לא אהבתי את סגנונה הספרותי של אוטוביוגרפיה זו. בכל שנות יצירתו הכבירה הפליג אפלפלד לנבכי חשכת השואה והוא עשה זאת בכשרון אנדתי וייחודי לו. אולי בשל היותו תמיד חש שהוא בן נוכרי לשפה העברית, אפלפלד פיתח לעצמו סגנון "יחסכניי"; מילים רזות ורכות אך בעלות עוצמת חדירה קסומה. כך, פעם אחר פעם, חשף בפנינו אפלפלד בסיפוריו הנשגבים אמיתות כואבות ואיומות מכל. והנה בא המחבר הנערץ לגלגל שוב את סיפורו האישי אך הפעם בדיבור ישיר והפעם, נכשל. "נכשלי" קודם כל בצורת הדיבור שיותר מכל, בעיקר בחלק השלישי מתוך שלושת פרקי האוטוביוגרפיה, סובלת מהתבטאות חסרת תחכום. זכותו של אפלפלד לכעוס על כל העולם, מדינת ישראל בכלל והמימסד הספרותי בפרט, וזכותו אף לשפוך זעמו על השפה העברית; "רבית ושפת אמי אבדו לי לעולמים, והשפה הזאת שהבטיחה להיות שפת אם אינה אלא אם חורגת". אך האם באמת התכוון, להיפטר מהזהות הישראלית? כך ממש משתמע מדבריו!

"הדפים שלפנינו הם פרק זכרון והתבוננות. הזיכרון שלנו חמקמק וסלקטיבי ונוצר מה שהוא בוחר לנצור" מקדים אפלפלד להסביר בדברי הפתיחה לסיפור חיים. כמובן, זכותו של אפלפלד לבחור ולמיין את העובדות כרצונו. בסיפוריו עשה אהרן אפלפלד מלאכת מיון וסיפור מופלאה. ואילו כאן, באוטוביוגרפיה, ישנה איזו חתירה אובססיבית לעיצוב תדמית בלתי מובנת המעוררת דחייה. חבל, שכן בלי כל צל של ספק, אהרן אפלפלד הוא אחד מגדולי הסופרים העברים בדורנו.

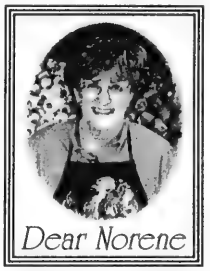
About Food



By NORENE GILLETZ

This decadent cake is perfect for last-minute entertaining. The recipe comes from Chocolate (From Simple Cookies to Extravagant Showstoppers) by Nick Malgieri (HarperCollins, $49.95).

The subtitle describes the book perfectly! Winner of the 1998 Julia Child Cookbook Award, Baking Category, this is a must-have for everyone's cookbook shelf. The coloured photographs are almost good enough to eat!

As a special touch to mark the new millennium, why not decorate the top of the cake (or any round cake) like the face of a clock! Melt one square of semisweet chocolate over low heat. Transfer to a pastry bag fitted with a writing tip. Decorate cake, marking the numbers 12, three, six and nine. Happy New Year! Enjoy.

EASY FLOURLESS CHOCOLATE CAKE

Cake:
8 tbsp. (1 stick) unsalted butter at room temperature
¼ cup sugar
7 large eggs, separated
8 oz. semisweet chocolate, melted and cooled
Pinch salt

Finishing:
¼ cup seedless raspberry preserves
1 cup whipping cream
3 tbsp. sugar

Use one 9-inch springform pan, buttered; line bottom with a disk of parchment or wax paper. Set rack at middle level of oven; preheat to 350.

Beat butter and sugar until light, with a hand mixer at medium speed, or in a heavy-duty mixer using paddle attachment, about 3 to 5 minutes. Add yolks one at a time, beating until smooth after each addition. Beat in chocolate.

In a clean, dry bowl, beat egg whites with salt until soft peaks form. Stir about a third of whites into batter, then, using a rubber spatula, gently fold in remaining whites.

Pour batter into prepared pan; smooth to make the top even. Bake about 40 minutes, until well risen and centre is firm and elastic to a fingertip.

Cool cake in pan for 5 minutes; invert onto a rack to cool completely. Slide cake onto a platter.

To finish, place preserves in a small pan and stir over low heat to melt. Pour preserves into centre of cake. Cool to room temperature.

Whip cream with sugar until soft peaks form. Spread over top of cake, covering preserves, shortly before serving.

Serving: Cut into 10 or 12 wedges. Serve with fresh fruit or berries on the side, if desired.

Storage: To make cake ahead, cool and double-wrap in plastic wrap. Store in refrigerator several days or in freezer several months. Bring cake to room temperature before finishing (can be done shortly before serving). Pour preserves over; leave at room temperature. Whip cream and refrigerate. Spread whipped cream on cake shortly before serving.

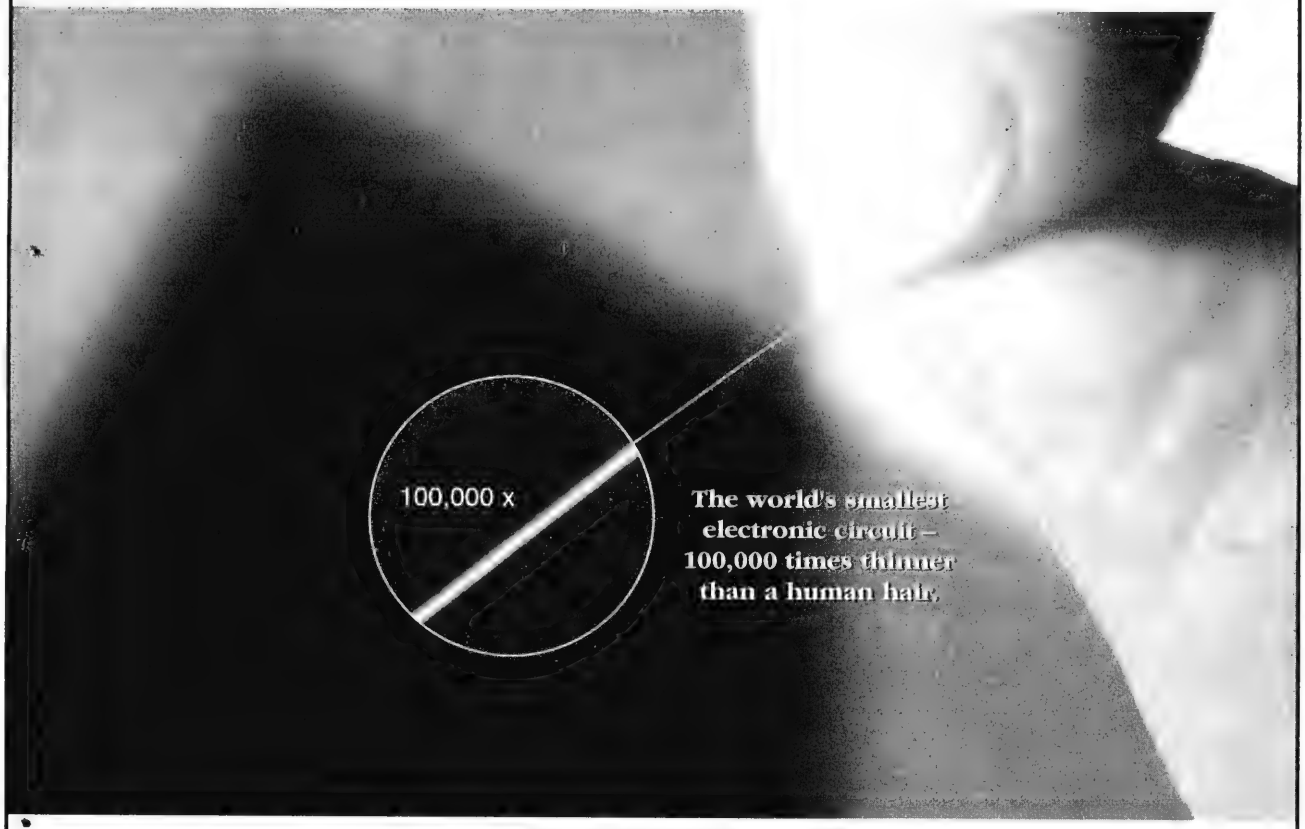
This itty-bitty discovery is one of our biggest breakthroughs ever.



Technion is a global centre for education and cutting-edge research in the fields of medicine, science, architecture and engineering. Technion scientists recently made headlines around the world with their discovery that broke the final frontiers of conventional microelectronics.

Using the self-assembling properties of DNA, scientists assembled silver particles into a conductive wire 100,000 times thinner than a human hair, making a quantum leap in nanotechnology. This discovery has paved the way for a high-tech future that, until now, has been the stuff of science fiction.

This itty-bitty circuit is just one of hundreds of dramatic breakthroughs for which Technion is famous.

"It was a hard round but we're in the right direction," said Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak after the first round of peace discussions in Washington last week with Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk a-Sha'ara. The parties are scheduled to return to Washington on Jan.3 to resume negotiations. In Israel, (see photo inset) residents of the Golan protested the Washington meetings. RNS/Reuters/photos]

A look at Jewish life 1,000 years ago

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS
Special to The CJN

It is widely assumed that the long-term trend of society is upwards – towards higher living standards, better government, more concern for the individual. But at the beginning of the millennium, which is now about to end, that was certainly not the case – not for Jews, and not for the broader population.

On the contrary, the general quality of life had indeed considerably deteriorated in the previous thousand years, and this downward trend was to continue well into the new millennium. Compared to the days when Rome ruled much of the world there was now weaker security, more crime, less education and culture, lower standards of living, and inferior technology.

As an example of the last of these items, the Romans had constructed paved roads, and plied ships of 5,000 tons on the sea; by the year 1000 dirt-tracks had replaced paved roads, and the largest ships weighed a mere 500 tons.

For Jews, the new millennium ushered in an era of increasing intolerance, more pogroms, and more expulsions. Jews had, of course, experienced persecution and suffering already in Roman times, at the beginning of what is called the first millennium.

Indeed, we tend to look upon Rome as our arch-enemy, and as the epitome of ferocity and cruelty. That is because it was they who fought the Jewish people in a war which destroyed Jerusalem, and then again in the Bar Kochba war.

But these wars, destructive as they were, developed as the result of Jewish rebellions, and constituted political-military campaigns, in no way comparable to the ceaseless and widespread hatred of Jews which the next millennium was to unleash.

Getting to an agreement

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The stakes are high for Ehud Barak in his talks with the Syrians. Should the Israeli negotiating team fail to work out a good agreement, not only could the public reject the pact in a referendum, but Barak's future as prime minister could be jeopardized.

Commentary

Israel must seek a reasonable agreement, a package deal with terms that give it something in return for making painful concessions.

The News in Brief

CANADA

HIPPY Program for Kids

VANCOUVER — HIPPY, the world-renowned Home Instruction Program for Preschool Youngsters, has come to Canada, thanks to the National Council of Jewish Women and a recently announced grant from Health Canada of $437,000. The grant is for a four-year pilot program in Vancouver aimed at helping low-income and immigrant families prepare children for school.

Access To Health Services

TORONTO — As of September 2000, all school-aged children in Ontario will have equal access to publicly funded school health services including nursing, physiotherapy, dietitian services and speech therapy, said Elizabeth Witmer, provincial health minister, at a meeting last week with key stakeholders, including the Ontario Alliance of Jewish Schools. The services, to be provided through 43 community care access centres, will fulfil a pre-election promise made by Premier Mike Harris.

ISRAEL

Commandos Kill Two

JERUSALEM — Israeli commandos killed two Hamas fugitives and nabbed three others during a raid last week on the terrorists' hideout in a village west of Hebron. Members of the cell were reportedly planning to carry out an attack against Israel.

Traffic Deaths Down

JERUSALEM — The number of traffic deaths in Israel in the first 11 months of this year dropped by 13.7 percent over the same period a year earlier, police figures show. A similar rate of decline, 13.2 percent, was also registered in the number of accidents during the same period. As well, police revoked over 9,000 drivers' licenses since the start of 1999, an 18 percent increase over the previous 12 months.

Y2K Shuts Reactor

JERUSALEM — Israel's nuclear reactor near the town of Dimona will be shut down on New Year's Eve and New Year's Day to prevent possible malfunctions related to the Y2K bug. Despite the planned shutdown, the Prime Minister's Office says Israel's nuclear facilities meet the standards to combat any year 2000-related computer glitches.

WORLD

Russia Returns Torahs

MOSCOW — The Russian government returned 10 Torah scrolls which had been looted by the Nazis or confiscated by the state during the Soviet era. Last week's transfer of the scrolls to Russian Jewry from the state archives was the highlight of a conference of the Congress of Jewish Religious Communities and Organizations of Russia.

The Swiss Image

BERN — The Swiss cabinet last week rejected a request from liberal lawmakers to publish the names of the 51,000 refugees who received asylum in Switzerland during World War II. "We will not use the names of Holocaust victims for a PR campaign for Switzerland," said a government spokesperson. At the same time, the Swiss Parliament approved a plan to spend $8 million to improve the country's image abroad.

Sephardi Shul Opens

MOSCOW — Israel's Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, participated in the dedication last week of Moscow's first Sephardi synagogue. The event reflects the growing size and influence of Jews from the Caucasus region in Moscow's Jewish life.

Spectre of Holocaust

UNITED NATIONS — The head of an independent team that investigated the UN response to the 1994 genocide in Rwanda recalled another genocide – the Holocaust – in delivering the team's report last week to the United Nations. "In May 1944, I was a young boy – 10 years old – when I saw the white buses with the Red Cross coming from Germany with some of the few surviving Jews," team leader Ingvar Carlsson, the former Swedish prime minister, told UN secretary general, Kofi Annan. "I will never forget their voices, their faces, their eyes," he said. "I couldn't imagine that I would meet that kind of situation again. But I did in the site of genocide in Rwanda, talking to the survivors, to the families." Carlsson said he hoped the report would sound alarms in the hope of avoiding another genocide.

Florida's Jewish Boom

PALM BEACH — More than 10 percent of all U.S. Jews reside in the South Florida counties of Palm Beach, Broward and Miami-Dade. The Jewish population of those areas, now at 644,000, increased by 30 percent in the past 20 years.

Kirk Douglas's Simchah

LOS ANGELES — Actor Kirk Douglas celebrated his second bar mitzvah on his 83rd birthday. "Today I am 13 years old again," the screen legend said at a Dec. 9 ceremony. "I promise to be a good boy." Draped around his shoulders was the tallit he wore exactly 70 years earlier, when Issur Danielovitch, the son of Russian Jewish immigrants, marked his coming of age at a synagogue in New York.

Provinces Pass Holocaust Day Memorial Acts

More Canadian provinces are weighing – and passing – legislation to declare Holocaust Memorial Day.

This month, Prince Edward Island and Quebec passed bills that will mark Yom Hashoah as Holocaust Memorial Day in those provinces. They join Ontario, which passed similar legislation last year.

The government of PEI Premier Pat Binns passed the legislation Dec. 9. The next day, New Brunswick's legislature approved its bill's first reading. Final approval was expected this week.

Also last week, Quebec's National Assembly, in response to a private member's bill put forward by MNA Lawrence Bergman, adopted legislation that will mark Yom Hashoah in the province.

British Columbia is considering passing a similar bill. The province has already recognized the day through an order in council.

Officials stress these will not be statutory holidays but rather an opportunity to remember and pay tribute to the victims of the Holocaust.

Canadian Jewish Congress hailed the developments.

Accused Israeli soldier denies involvement

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A 19-year-old Israeli soldier wanted in the beating death of 15-year-old Matti Baranovski was arrested in Israel last Sunday.

Daniel Weiz was taken into custody by military police at Canada's request as he was returning to his army unit, and handed over to civilian authorities in Jerusalem. He was scheduled to make a court appearance this past Tuesday, at which prosecutors were planning to ask that he be held for 45 days pending an extradition request.

Toronto police have charged Weiz with second-degree murder in connection with Baranovski's Nov. 14 swarming and murder.

Weiz's lawyer has said she will oppose both his arrest and his extradition, and says he denies involvement in the crime, saying he's "completely amazed" that he's being linked to it.

Weiz did not escape from Canada and made no attempt to hide in Israel, his lawyer said.

Toronto police say they will travel to Israel as soon as an extradition order is issued by Canadian authorities. But local police officers were believed to be on their way to Jerusalem as of last Monday.

As The CJN went to press Monday morning, Canada had not yet filed a formal request to have Weiz extradited.

The process is a long and bureaucratic one. The attorney general of Ontario must ask the federal justice minister to make the request. Once the justice minister approves the request for extradition, it is forwarded to his or her counterpart in Israel, who forwards the file to the attorney general.

The Israeli courts then make the decision, after reviewing evidence presented by Toronto police.

A recently amended law in Israel states that an Israeli citizen and resident may be tried in a foreign country, as long as the other country agrees the suspect would serve his sentence in Israel if convicted.

Israeli Justice Ministry officials said Weiz would not be extradited without such a commitment from Canada. A source in the public prosecutor's office told the Ha'aretz daily that if Weiz is found guilty, Canadian authorities "must" send him back to Israel.

Toronto police are hoping Weiz will return to Canada voluntarily, in which case detectives would fly to Israel immediately to bring him back.

Officials in this country have said Weiz moved easily between Canada and Israel because he is an Israeli citizen and a landed

Canada, Israel sign new airline deal

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada and Israel have signed a new temporary agreement aimed at ending their dispute over air travel.

In effect, Israel has bowed to Canadian pressure by allowing daily Air Canada flights to and from the Jewish state. Israel had wanted the number of weekly Air Canada flights reduced to four in the winter months.

El Al will be allowed seven flights a week to Canada, up from the current five, and will be permitted to collect American passengers on flights to and from Canada, as long as it has agreements for joint operations with other airlines.

In addition, El Al and Air Canada will be able to overfly the territory of each other's country. Canada had threatened to bar Israeli planes from its airspace unless Air Canada was permitted daily flights, meaning El Al flights to U.S. destinations would have taken longer and burned more fuel.

The agreement will remain in effect until April 1, 2000, when it will either be renegotiated or superseded by a new air treaty between the two countries.

The deal was hammered out between Canadian and Israeli officials in Chicago and Ottawa earlier this month. It was signed Dec. 14 by the head of Israel's Civil Aviation Administration, Avner Yarkoni, and Canada's chief air negotiator, Serge April.

The agreement will not affect El Al's earlier decision to indefinitely suspend all its operations in Montreal as of Jan.1, 2000, says the airline's Quebec district manager, Albert Cohen.

El Al announced the suspension of its Montreal operations last month as a way to offset potential losses arising from this dispute.

The two weekly flights to and from Montreal will end New Year's Day, leaving three flights a week to and from Toronto as the carrier's sole Canadian traffic.

Thus, although El Al will be allowed seven flights a week to Canada, the airline will have only three as of Jan. 1 when it ends the Montreal flights.

Calling Jewish tourists

Tsion Ben-David, the director of North American operations for Israel's ministry of Tourism is an effusive, energetic and engaging conversationalist.

I should know because last month, in an elegant, kosher restaurant in the Hyatt Regency Hotel on Mount Scopus in Jerusalem, I engaged him in conversation.

Over the course of a pleasant evening, our conversation travelled across a broad range of subjects that began with his arrival in Israel from Bombay in 1949, one of a family of 11 who would all one day settle there, and that ended with the story of a near-fatal car accident in 1997 on the little-travelled, night-time highways of the wintery plains near Bismarck, North Dakota.

In between Bombay and Bismarck, our conversation stayed mostly in Jerusalem, that is, on the subject of Israel, more specifically on tourism in Israel.

Even with Israel's quick, soaring rise into high-tech and electronics-related commerce, tourism remains Israel's most important industry.

Among the many reasons for the importance of tourism to Israel, two stand out as above the rest. The first is financial; the second is, for lack of a better term, existential.

Ben-David underscored the financial significance of the industry by relating a number of different facts. Like a set of distinct steel spokes that converge at a common centre, the statistics strengthened his argument.

According to Ben-Zion, more than 100,000 families in Israel derive their income directly from tourism. When one factors into this statistic the average size of a family in Israel, that means as many as 750,000 people may depend on tourism for their main source of livelihood.

For every dollar spent in the tourism sector, Ben-Zion continued, 17 more dollars are generated throughout the economy. This figure compared to a ratio of one dollar to between five and six in the manufacturing and heavy industry sector and one dollar to between three and four in the agriculture sector.

For every 12 tourists who visit Israel, the financial benefit is equivalent to an entire annual salary for a newcomer family.

Given the unabating flow of newcomers to Israel since the collapse of communism in eastern Europe, it is a good thing therefore that there is also an unabating flow of tourists to Israel.

In 1999, 2.4 million tourists will have visited Israel. This represents an increase of 15 percent from the year before. Next year, 2000, tourism officials expect a further increase of up to a third more than the 1999 figures.

"The hype surrounding the 2000 celebration, has left the perception that we are over-crowded," Ben-Zion told me. "But that is simply not true.

"Israel has more than 40,000 hotel rooms ready to accommodate its visitors. We can host everyone who wants to come," Ben-Zion said. "We are expecting 3.2 million tourists in 1999; but we are prepared for four million."

When Ben-Zion relates these tourism figures, he does so with a matter-of-fact confidence and a palpable though understated sense of accomplishment. For it is indeed a remarkable accomplishment that this tiny country, which when stretched from head to toe lies neatly along the highway between Montreal and Toronto, will be able to host in one year, a number of tourists equal to half its own population.

Imagine Canada receiving 15 million tourists next year, or the United States receiving 150 million tourists! It could not and would not happen.

In Israel, however, it can happen and will happen.

Though he speaks casually, confidently, Ben-David does occasionally, during our discussion, cast a wistful gaze past my shoulder onto a fixed point somewhere in an undetermined horizon.

"More Jewish tourists are necessary," he pleads with me.

It saddens him, and not for financial reasons, that Jewish tourists are fewer in number – absolutely and proportionately – than non-Jewish tourists. This of course, touches upon the second reason, the existential one, that tourism is so important to Israel: it goes to the heart of Israel's relationship with Diaspora Jewry, which in turn goes to the heart of Israel's identity as a Jewish state as well as a state for all Jews, which in turn, goes to the heart of the very purpose that Israel exists.

Israel is more than a country; it is also an idea. Of course, the Jews of Israel lead their lives with their feet firmly touching the practical soil of the country, engaged each day in the mundane routines of making a living, paying a mortgage, raising children and serving in the army.

But they also lead their daily lives, with their feet occasionally touching the metaphysical soil of the idea that began at Sinai 3,500 years ago and that has endured ever since: that of peoplehood and of mission.

The relationship between the Jews of Israel, the country, and the Jews of the Diaspora confirms the enduring transcendence of Israel, the idea. One of the key expressions of that relationship is tourism.

Country without idea can lead to a form of idolatry; similarly, idea without country can lead to a form of extremism. Country and idea, therefore, complete each other. By extension, so do the Jews of Israel and the Jews of the Diaspora.

Many of the Jews of Israel, for a number of reasons, understand this very well. Sadly, it appears that most of the Jews of the Diaspora do not, yet.

Reaction to slave labor deal

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish reaction was mixed to last week's announcement of a $5.13 billion (US) fund to compensate forced and slave labourers during World War II.

"We obviously welcome justice, even at this late stage of the game," said Canadian Jewish Congress national president Moshe Ronen. "Many former labourers are old and frail and have been waiting for over 50 years."

The deal, announced in Berlin, will see the German government and at least 17 German companies contribute to the fund, to be distributed to over 1 million Nazi-era forced and slave labourers.

Ronen said that in this country, the number of one-time labourers is "in the hundreds."

Among them is Howard Chandler of Toronto. From 1942 to 1944, Chandler was a slave labourer in the Hermann Goering Werke in Starachowice, in Nazi-occupied Poland. He often worked 16-hour days in a blazingly hot smelter, making pig iron for the German war effort.

Compensation "would have been a big help a long time ago. Now, it's minimal," Chandler, 71, told The CJN.

"It's not about money. It's about getting some satisfaction. The Germans are anxious to bring this to an end."

Asked whether he thinks the amount is fair, Chandler said, "there's no such thing as fairness."

The deal will affect some 250,000 concentration camp survivors, about half of them Jewish, who were enslaved by German munitions factories and other industries during the war.

It will also compensate between 475,000 and 1.2 million forced labourers, most of them non-Jews from central and eastern Europe, who were deported to Nazi-held areas and put to work repairing infrastructure and on farms.

Former slaves are expected to receive individual payments of between $5,100 and $7,800, while one-time forced labourers will receive an estimated $2,600 to $3,100 (US).

Payments are not expected to be distributed until the summer.

"We welcome the agreement, despite the delay," said Gerda Frieberg, president of the newly formed Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada.

Her group is still busy trying to register all Jewish Holocaust survivors in Canada, estimated at between 16,000 and 18,000.

Frieberg said that in the coming months, the organization will seek information from the New York-based World Jewish Congress and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany on how the funds will be distributed.

In the meantime, those affected are being urged to fill out and return a one-page form available from the United Restitution Organization (URO).

Dora Elzbet of URO's Toronto office says the forms ask about dates, places and the nature of incarceration. They will be forwarded to URO's office in Frankfurt.

The forms are available by calling 416-630-2920 or in Montreal, 514-931-7933.

The German deal is more than the $3.3 billion the government and industries offered about six weeks ago, but far below the $10 billion some lawyers representing former labourers had demanded.

According to German officials, some 60 more companies are considering signing onto the deal, including several U.S. firms with German subsidiaries which used slave labour, such as Ford and Opel, the German branch of General Motors.

Robert Engel was 76

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Robert Engel, a well-known and much-loved Holocaust educator and community volunteer, died last Thursday after a brief battle with cancer. He was 76.

Obituary

Robbie, as he was known to almost everyone, always had a sparkle in his eye and spring in his step. He talked mainly about two things: his war-time experiences, and scouting.

Robert Engel

He was involved with Scouts Canada for years, organizing and attending scouting jamborees and spearheading the annual visit to Toronto by Israeli scouts. He headed the Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting and Guiding.

Engel was involved with the Holocaust Remembrance Committee for years, speaking to students and attending events. He was only recently named secretary of the newly formed Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada.

"I'm devastated," said the organization's president, Gerda Frieberg. "He was a pillar in so many areas."

Born in Berlin in 1923, Engel left his school in 1936 because he couldn't stand the lessons in racial indoctrination from his Nazi teachers.

His mother had registered him for the Kindertransport of children to safe countries, and at the age of 15, he fled to Amsterdam, where he spent time in two refugee camps before living with a foster family and becoming active in the underground.

Following the German invasion of Holland, he was shipped to Westerbork, a transit camp and portal to Auschwitz. Most of his large family perished in the camps.

He was liberated in April, 1945 by Canadian troops, which led to his lifelong love affair with Canada, where he settled in 1951.

A rare honour came his way in 1995, when Engel's picture, taken from his Dutch identification card, appeared on a Canadian postage stamp that marked the 50th anniversary of the end of the war.

Engel leaves his wife of 54 years, Margo; two daughters, Evelyn and Renee; and three grandchildren, Tamara, Deborah and Lee.

UJA campaign tops $42 million

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 has raised a total of over $42 million.

Some 200 campaign volunteers celebrated the achievement at a festive campaign closing event, held last week at Adath Israel Congregation.

"The language of UJA is compassion, community and commitment," said Glennie Lindenberg, who co-chaired the evening with Peter Ekstein.

The funds raised are allocated locally and to the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The agency's chair, Sallai Meridor, thanked the volunteers "on behalf of the people we are helping," including Jewish and non-Jewish war victims in Kosovo and the former Yugoslavia, as well as more than 75,000 Jewish immigrants being brought to Israel this year.

He also thanked the community for the opportunity to meet with a group of Grade 11 and 12 students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

The younger generation of Jews must be given the ability to connect to other Jews beyond the boundaries of their own communities, Meridor said.

Israel and Diaspora Jewish communities are "interdependent... We should realize that only if we have a strong Israel can we have a strong Jewish people, and only if we have a strong Jewish people can we have a strong Israel. That's what we have to assure for the next generation."

The UJA Federation campaign is "about people: those who are frail, elderly, those in physical danger, those in danger of losing their Judaism, those who have financial handicaps and those who have physical or developmental challenges," said David Engel, who co-chaired Campaign 2000 with Mel Wolfond.

Engel paid tribute to Carole Sterling, chair of Women's Campaign, which has raised nearly $4.2 million. The program also included awards for dozens of the volunteers.

Gerry Halbert, chair of the Past Chairmans' Council, announced that next year's campaign co-chairs will be Ron Frisch and Ed Sonshine, and that Dodie Weill will chair Women's Campaign.

And in honour of Wolfond and his wife Pedie (the artist who designed the colourful Campaign 2000 t-shirts), their sons Chad, Greg and Henry will donate $1 million toward a new centre for Jewish campus life at the University of Toronto, Halbert said.

The families of Saul and Henry Koschitzky have also pledged a major gift to the facility, Halbert added.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, to be located at the corner of Harbord and Huron Streets, is a joint project of UJA Federation and Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

Jewish Agency head backs Law of Return

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sallai Meridor's father and mother made aliyah from Russia and Vienna respectively, just before World War II.

Meridor, brother of former Israeli cabinet minister Dan Meridor, often thinks about how his life would have been different if they hadn't.

The 44-year-old sabra, who has chaired the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel and the World Zionist Organization since May, realizes that but for a twist of fate he could have been raised in Eastern Europe, disconnected from his Jewish heritage, like many of the more recent olim from the Former Soviet Union.

"I would not have wanted to have a State of Israel that closes the doors on me if I wanted to come back," he said in an interview last week. "We should be proud that the State of Israel is open to every Jew or people of Jewish descent who want to come back to the Jewish people and live with the Jewish people as Jews."

The Law of Return has come under fire recently from some Arab Israelis, post-Zionist Jews and Orthodox critics, noted Meridor, adding "it would be a great mistake" to change the law.

"It's not something Israel gives every Jew," he added. "It's something every Jew is born with."

About 25 percent of new immigrants to Israel – mostly from the FSU – are not halachically Jewish, Meridor noted. "Now we should help them to come back. We should put a major effort into helping these people who desire to integrate into the Jewish society."

Meridor was in town last week as guest speaker at the closing celebration of UJA Federation's Campaign 2000. While here, he also met with local Jewish leaders and a group of students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Sallai Meridor

The Jewish Agency, with which Meridor has been associated since 1992, has three main areas of focus, he told The CJN: bringing Jews to Israel; education; and "making sure we are one people, connected and involved with an Israel that is relevant and caring for the Jewish people."

The agency's budget of $376 million (US) is about $50 million less than it was four years ago, Meridor said.

Cutbacks have taken place in areas of education in the West and some services to new immigrants, as well as in personnel. Staff has been cut from over 2,000 people a few years ago to fewer than 1,000 today, he noted.

The changes have been positive in terms of making the agency more efficient, but less so in terms of providing services – such as absorption centre housing – to new immigrants he said.

Among the agency's Canadian partnerships is the project that sends shlichim to Jewish schools here. The agency helps locate and train the emissaries, who are paid locally by the schools.

For the Jewish people to thrive, Meridor said, there's a need for global Jewish partnership.

NDP leader wants trade body to become more democratic

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —When world political and trade leaders gathered in Seattle in November to launch talks for a new trade pact, they probably did not anticipate the massive opposition by a number of interest groups.

"The WTO and its supporters, including Canadian leaders, is becoming a real threat to democracy. It has no community interest and no interest in human rights," said Federal New Democratic Party leader Alexa McDonough at the fourth annual Louis Lenkinski Lecture on Human Rights in honor of the late labour leader and activist.

> 'It has no interest in human rights'

While acknowledging that "globalization is here and we can't go back," she said that "we can demand widespread liberalization of trade with human and social economic rights intact."

Born in Ottawa and brought up in Nova Scotia, the NDP leader said her father shared an office in Ottawa with the late David Lewis, a former national NDP leader. "Through that period my father was influenced by Jewish culture and faith and he knew Louis Lenkinski intimately."

The late labour leader would probably have been among the 30,000 to 40,000 ordinary citizens who protested policies of the WTO in Seattle, McDonough said.

"How do we continue Louis' legacy into the millennium? The fight is far from over. We need a new chapter in global human rights.

"The market economy for working people is not working. The WTO is an assembly for making the world safe for capitalism. Health, education, cultural and poverty issues are losing out."

The WTO should become more open and democratic, she said, and Canada should be leading the fight.

McDonough praised Helen, Lenkinski's wife, for her volunteer work – talking to young people about their problems.

Lenkinski's son, Lionel, said his father was a supporter of the NDP.

McDonough's speech was sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. She was introduced by Keith Landy, region chair.

Rabbi Jordan Pearlson paid tribute to the labour leader.

A copy of the book Israel at 50 was presented to McDonough by Ellen Cole, chair of the community relations committee.

Deal with Syria expected: expert

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Israeli expert on Syria says he expects the current peace talks between Israel and Syria to end in an agreement.

"I take it for granted," said Yossi Olmert in an interview here last week. He visited Toronto and Ottawa to meet with UJA Federation campaign leaders.

Olmert (brother of Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert) has been dealing with Syrian affairs for almost 20 years. He was a participant in the Madrid peace conference and a member of the Israeli delegation in peace talks with Syria. Earlier this year he served as a political consultant to former Israeli defence minister Moshe Arens.

An economist by training, Olmert was a visiting professor at York University in the mid-1980s. He is based in Ra'anana and is a political columnist for a number of Israeli publications.

A peace agreement with Syria – a "militant, radical Arab country with a long tradition of hostility to Israel" – would be a far cry from real peace or a cultural meeting of the two nations, said Olmert.

If Israel's relationship with Egypt is a "cold peace," then peace between Israel and Syria would be "very frozen," he said wryly.

"But that's okay. I don't entertain any illusions. We need to remove the danger of war and terrorism once and for all. If this is a stepping stone along those lines, it's a very welcome development."

He believes Syria is capable of maintaining security along the Lebanese border with Israel, an expected condition of the agreement under discussion.

Olmert describes himself as a "maverick Likudnik – a Likudnik who is not afraid to say we should make peace, and that in order to achieve peace we have to [adjust] to realities of the situation and make concessions." He's been around far too long to think Israel can negotiate without giving up land, he said.

"It will be difficult for [Israeli Prime Minister Ehud] Barak to achieve what he wants to achieve with Syria and not give up the entire Golan Heights."

Barak is "definitely a courageous politician" to handle two risky sets of negotiations simultaneously, Olmert added, referring to concurrent Israeli-Palestinian talks.

Olmert is concerned about the durability of an agreement between

Yossi Olmert

Israel and Syria, its fate when Syrian president Hafez al-Assad is no longer in power, and the implications for Israeli settlers in the Golan Heights.

"The settlers are good Israeli citizens," Olmert said. "I think the Barak government will be clever enough to handle the situation in a very considerate way...Barak will have to remember that he promised to be the prime minister of all of us."

Although Olmert does not foresee internal violence in Israel, he said he hoped heated discussions would not become violent. "That would be a disaster," he said. People who would use violence would "ruin their case," he added.

As the year changes

Though the coming year 2000 holds no religious significance for the Jewish people, there is no denying a heightened measure of anticipation and transition as we prepare to peel away the last page of the calendar. Our entire planet is tied, scientifically and commercially, to the Christian calibration of the passage of time. As the year is about to change, therefore, it is not inappropriate to examine some of the hallmarks of our Canadian way of life.

The Canadian way of life is still the envy of most of the rest of the world, and deservedly so. We live in a democratic society, relatively free of the fear of random crime, in which our rights and freedoms are guaranteed "subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law."

Canada is a land of vast and diverse geographies, of unquantifiable natural abundance and of imposing physical beauty. Since the middle of this century, it has become a place where cultural diversity is respected and encouraged.

Our economy is irreversibly and at times, dangerously, tied to that of the United States. Due to the fact that the American economy is presently very strong, the Canadian economy is experiencing significant prosperity.

Historically, public policy in Canada has evolved around the well-being of the community in furtherance of peace, order and good government rather than, for example, around the well-being of the individual in furtherance of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. As a result, Canadians have always expected of their governments to find that fine balance in public policy between the imperatives of social justice and compassion and the forces of free enterprise and business.

But the hallmarks of the Canadian way of life, so widely envied abroad, appear at home with increasing, worrisome regularity to be showing an unsettling tarnish. The governmental ethos that once distinguished us as a moderate and caring society is being tortuously whittled down into something less recognizably "Canadian." It is of course, foolish to regret that our traditionally distinct Canadian approach to public policy may be changing. Nothing can remain forever unchanged. This is as true of the physical world as it is of the world of public policy.

But it is utterly incongruous and morally indefensible that, on the eve of the year 2000, alongside such undeniable prosperity there is also such undeniable poverty, especially, child poverty; that alongside such breathtaking advancements in science and technology, some hospital emergency rooms must close their doors to the sick and the needy; that alongside the increase in residential and commercial construction, so many people live on the streets, destitute, homeless, without protection against the fierce Canadian winter.

Despite the inevitability of change, we need not accept all change. We certainly need not accept these incongruities. They are moral blemishes. And we must refuse to allow them to become the new hallmarks of the Canadian way of life. The year 2000 must be better than the year 1999. As the clock ticks past midnight on the last day of December, this must be our hope for the new year.

For those of us not asleep at that instant, remember that hope and remember too, Shabbat shalom.

Not just a Jewish problem

It is disappointing that The CJN would print a piece like Bruce Elman's "Yes, but ..." (Dec. 9) defending explicit government discrimination against Jews and other religious minorities. The UN says that Ontario's Catholic-only denominational school funding is illegal discrimination, but Elman defends Ontario's refusal to comply. The various pieces of misinformation on which he based his argument demand a reply:

- It's not a "Jewish problem" as the piece claims, since about three-quarters of the affected religious minorities are not Jewish.
- Contrary to what the piece suggests, the federal government agreed to the UN human rights treaty in 1976 with the explicit approval of all the provinces including Ontario, so there is no unfairness or jurisdictional problem in holding Ontario to the obligations set out in the treaty.
- The "spectre" raised by Elman that eliminating religious discrimination in education funding will harm the public system is not supported by actual examples of places where funding was extended.
- Finally the article tries to scare us into thinking that accepting funding will lead to unacceptable government influence over the curriculum, etc. The reality is that Jewish schools already comply with government curriculum standards (which are mandatory if the school wants to grant high school diplomas), and funding has been extended elsewhere without infringing on the autonomy necessary to provide Jewish education.

Elman simply glosses over the severe financial hardships faced by the Jewish community and Jewish families in order to provide our children with a suitable Jewish education.

Ottawa has good ideas too

Re "Synagogues unite to create kosher food bank," (CJN, Dec. 9). I just wanted to let you know that not all good ideas start in Toronto.

My parents, Dr. Saul and Mrs. Pamela Ross, and the social action committee of the Agudath Israel Synagogue in Ottawa started a kosher food bank in Ottawa a couple of years ago. As far as I know, this service has been very successful and well used. The social action committee also oversees a number of other projects, such as a tutoring service for students.

In praise of Mosquitos

After reading the article "But for a quirk of Fate" (CJN, Dec. 9), by Eddy Kaplansky, former pilot in the newly formed Israeli Air Force of 1948, I was surprised to learn China had purchased 200 war surplus Mosquitos from Canada.

Being with a Hurricane fighter squadron, we quickly realized the Mosquito fighter bombers built of plywood in Malton, Ont., with their super speed could outfly and outnumber any of our Hurricanes and Spitfires. They were a fabulous aircraft in the hands of a good pilot.

Sometime in 1944, the RCAF declared them obsolescent and later obsolete. It was a sad sight to see when they landed without so much as a locked undercarriage or even a flat tire. Our orders were: "Tow them off the runway and put a match to 'em."

The jet age had arrived, the first Sabre Jets, Vampires and FBO Shooting Stars were being welcomed by the Canucks, the Luftwaffe was finished, our war arming the Hurricanes with ammo and rockets was over. Thanks Eddy Kaplansky for the memories.

Seeking civic-minded people

Re: "New Organization launched for Holocaust Survivors" (CJN, Dec. 2). People purporting to represent the interests of Holocaust survivors at large arrogated to themselves executive positions and anointed the former regional chair of Canadian Jewish Congress (1992-95) as their chair (in reference to compensation claims for survivors.)

It would have been appropriate to enunciate in advance the formation of such an organization, thus giving the survivors an opportunity for input and elected representation and not confront them with the fait accompli. What is needed is not bandwagon jumpers or kudos scroll collectors, but genuine civic-minded people to attempt to ameliorate the circumstances for the victims of World War II and post-World War II, who thus far have been overlooked and need most urgent attention.

Poland became graveyard

In reply to Hanna Sokolski (CJN, Nov. 25), permit me to clarify the true facts. As long as we, the witnesses to the history, are alive, I will scream loud and clear.

The camps were not "labour," but death camps and they were built and run by the Germans. No, the Polish people were not responsible for the Holocaust. But Hitler chose the right ground on which to execute his cruel plan. The Polish Catholics were totally indifferent to the cruelty going on for years among them.

And yes, Poland is the country that became the graveyard for millions of European Jews.

A millennial Jewish timeline

Compiled by PETER EPHROSS
JTA Staff Writer

The following is a list of some of the important Jewish dates of the last 1,000 years, with an emphasis prior to the 20th century:

1009 – The oldest existing text of the full Hebrew Bible is written.
1070 – Rashi, a French Jewish thinker, completes his commentaries on most of the Bible.
1096 – Participants in the First Crusade massacre Jews in several Central European cities, beginning centuries of pogroms linked to the Crusades. In 1099, Jerusalem falls to the Crusaders.
1124 – Records of a Jewish gate in Kiev attest to the presence of a Jewish community there.
1139 – Judah Halevi completes his influential philosophy of Judaism known as The Kuzari. He is a friend of commentator Abraham Ibn Ezra, who also left Spain for the life of a wandering Jewish scholar.
1144 – Jews in Norwich, England are accused of murdering a Christian child in what is believed to be the first ritual murder charge. The blood libel, as well as others in England that follow in the 12th century, incites anti-Jewish violence.
1195 – Moses Maimonides completes The Guide to the Perplexed, considered the most important work of medieval Jewish thought.
1232 – The Jewish community of Marrakesh, Morocco, is re-established, leading to massacres of Jews caused by Islamic political revolt and grass-roots hatred.
1239 – Pope Gregory IX orders the kings of France, England, Spain and Portugal to confiscate Hebrew books. Following this edict, the Talmud is condemned and burned in France and Rome.
1286 – Moses de Leon of Spain completes a commentary of the Torah. The Zohar remains a central text of Jewish mysticism.
1290 – King Edward I banishes all Jews from England. It is the first of numerous expulsions of European Jews during the Middle Ages.
1333 – Casimir the Great takes power in Poland and brings with a him a sympathetic attitude toward the Jews, who benefit as a result.
1488 – The first complete edition of the Hebrew Bible is printed in Soncino, Italy.
1492 – The Jews of Spain are expelled as part of the Spanish Inquisition. The majority flee to Portugal, and eventually to North Africa and Turkey.
1516 – Jews in Venice are relegated to a ghetto, the most extreme segregation to which Jews had been submitted. Over time, Jews in many lands are similarly segregated.
ca.* 1525-1609 – The life of Rabbi Judah Loew of Prague, creator of the legendary Golem, the mythical creature that protects Prague Jews from their enemies.
1526 – The Prague Haggadah, which contains the oldest known printed Yiddish poem, is published.
1543 – German religious reformer Martin Luther writes About the Jews and Their Lies, considered the first modern anti-Semitic tract.

1565 – The Shulchan Aruch, Joseph Caro's authoritative code of Jewish law, is first printed in Venice.
1569 – The kabbalist Isaac Luria settles in Safed. Luria's ideas give rise to a new form of Jewish mysticism.
1622-1629 – Persian Jews are forced to convert to Islam.
1648 – Ukrainian peasants led by Bogdan Chmielnicki revolt against their Polish landlords and Jewish agents. Some 100,000 Jews die in the uprising.

1666 – The false messiah Shabbetai Zevi converts to Islam after being faced with the possibility of death if he remains a Jew.
1719 – Glueckel of Hameln, a Jewish businesswoman, completes her memoirs. These remain an important source of Jewish history and culture of the time.
1740 – The Ba'al Shem Tov, the founder of Chassidism, takes up residence at Medzibezh, Podolia, now part of Ukraine.
1777 – The Jews of New York are granted equality under the law.

Opinions

Millennial blessing

There are a lot of fears about the arrival of the millennium. We are assured that the Y2K bug has been taken care of, or whatever one has to do to convince computers that "00" does not mean 1900 but 2000. But such assurances fall on a lot of ears whose owners remain suspicious and have stocked enough provisions to last them through a few weeks beginning Dec. 31.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In Israel, authorities fear that crazy "pilgrims" will create havoc in hope that they will bring on a messianic miracle that they associate with the coming millennium.

So, it was with some pleasure that I read of a recent meeting in Rome that had a different fall-out, something worth telling my readers. The writer of the following is a rabbi who, long ago, made aliyah from the United States. The event he describes took place at the end of October.

"Last week, I attended an Interreligious Assembly at the Vatican, which was convened by the Pontifical Council of Interreligious Dialogue and the Central Committee for the Great Jubilee of the Year 2000. Titled, On the Eve of the Millennium: Collaboration Between the Different Religions, it was a remarkable gathering of over 200 religious leaders from around the world, representing more than 20 world religions. There were about 10 Jews. I was the only one from Israel. The others were from the United States, England and France.

"I had some amazing experiences at this conference. On the way up to my room on the first day, I met a Christian leader from Lebanon and said, 'Hi neighbour.' He responded by saying that he hoped that I could visit him soon in Beirut.

"The next day, I sat next to a bishop from Syria at breakfast, who invited me to Damascus and expressed the hope that there will soon be a peace agreement between Israel and Syria. I responded by saying, Inshallah, which is Arabic for God willing.

"On the second and third days of the conference, I moderated a discussion group which included people from Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Japan, England, the United States, Korea and probably a few other places. It was fascinating. We talked a lot about the positive role that religion and religious leaders could play in helping to promote peace between peoples and people. The spirit was congenial and the discussions were enlightening. There were no confrontations: only genuine dialogue and real listening to one another. It was truly amazing!

"On the final day of the conference, one of the people from my discussion group who was from a neighbouring Arab country, came up to me at the coffee break and said, 'You know, this was the first time in my life that I have ever met or talked to a Jew, let alone a rabbi. We have a lot to talk about, including some painful issues.' I responded by saying how much I enjoyed having this person in my dialogue group and how much I appreciated her telling me this. I agreed that we had a lot to talk about and that I was glad that we were able to begin talking.

"It was a spiritually uplifting event, one that inspired me to continue my work for peace and peaceful relations between peoples and people in Israel."

Barak's referendum

When Ehud Barak and Jean Chrétien met in Turkey last month, they discussed several issues of mutual concern such as the peace process and the dispute over Air Canada flights to Israel.

They could also have discussed their respective plans for a referendum. Even as Prime Minister Chrétien has been setting out his conditions for dealing with a referendum on Quebec, Prime Minister Barak has to address the referendum he promised on peace with Syria.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Right now, attention is focused on the difficult process with Syria itself, but at its conclusion, Barak is committed to taking the question to the Israeli public.

A referendum is a new experience for Israelis. No prime minister has ever transferred ultimate responsibility for a decision to any body other than the Knesset. In Israel's system of proportional representation, the assumption has always been that the full spectrum of public views is reflected in the parliament, and that a Knesset majority could accurately represent a public majority.

In 1979, the peace treaty with Egypt was hotly debated in the Knesset, and was passed with an overwhelming majority of the governing Likud party, and by definition, the Labour opposition.

In 1995, the peace treaty with Jordan also received a strong majority. Peace with Jordan has historically been a consensual issue in Israel, and there was little public opposition to it.

The upcoming referendum originated in two separate moves. Towards the end of its term, the last Knesset passed a law stating that any territorial concessions affecting state land would require agreement by referendum. The move was instigated by the Third Way – a one-term party that ran in 1996 on a single-issue platform of keeping the Golan under Israeli rule.

A public referendum was seen as potentially deterring a prime minister from proceeding with an agreement that might enjoy a parliamentary majority, but, in turn, might fail in the court of public opinion.

The law called for a simple majority, and for the right to vote in the referendum for all Israeli citizens. A referendum could be interpreted as a constitutional change because the Knesset is transferring its authority to the public.

As a result, the decision was to legislate a Referendum Bill as a Basic Law (Israel's equivalent of constitutional authority, requiring a majority of 81 Knesset members).

Independently, but in response to an active lobby on the Golan issue, then prime ministerial candidate Ehud Barak committed himself to a referendum on any peace treaty with Syria.

Minister of Justice Yossi Beilin has already completed the first drafting of the Referendum Bill, which calls for the referendum to take place within 30-60 days of Knesset approval of the treaty by at least 61 (of 120) votes.

Canadians will not be surprised to learn that the key issues are the clarity of the question, and the acceptable majority in the response.

The question is likely to be straightforward, if lengthy. Since the referendum will be held only once a negotiated treaty is made public, the question will, in effect, be the treaty itself. Israelis will be asked to simply vote "yes" or "no."

The nature of the majority has already been contentious. While the draft bill accepts a majority of one vote as valid, some Knesset members have called for a Jewish majority as the only acceptable option. Others have been more subtle, and have called for a special majority, thereby ensuring that Arab votes will not count.

The solicitor general immediately responded with a firm statement clarifying the validity of all votes, but this issue will fester. In fact, a slim majority would be an albatross for Barak, just as a reliance on Arab parties for a Knesset majority handicapped prime ministers in the past. A loss will force new elections.

The referendum campaign will be at least as vigorous as a national election campaign, and the battle lines are already drawn.

Barak has the value of peace and his military track record on his side, while the Opposition will play on the historic value of settlements and the human cost of dismantling them.

But no one will be able to accuse Barak of misleading the public on his intentions.

Throughout the 1996 negotiations with the Syrians, Rabin was haunted by his earlier promise that Israel would not abandon the Golan.

Barak is already being remembered as the man who in 1997 spoke to Golan settlers of the price that would have to be paid for peace.

Although he was booed by his audience, two years later was supported by 57 percent of the settlers in the prime ministerial election. He is counting on this support as he moves toward the historic task of negotiating a secure peace with Syria.

Jews and crime

No one wants to start the so-called new millennium on a sour note. But it seems to me that there have been a series of news stories of late which have turned a spotlight on Jewish criminals active directly or indirectly in Canada.

A major spread in the Globe and Mail dissected the checkered career of Jeff Givens, the former owner of the Just Desserts restaurant, scene of the gruesome murder of Vivi Leimonis in Toronto some years ago. Other news accounts have dealt with the more exotic saga of Joseph Prushinowski of the Tash chassidic community of Boisbriand in Quebec, an alleged arch swindler now on trial in Jerusalem.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

But more troubling have been the stories, published and whispered, about Russian (and Jewish) criminality. As I write, police have cracked down on a widespread, criminal operation said to be "eastern European," dealing in crimes ranging from drugs to sophisticated bank card fraud. Several of the names seem Jewish – though many are not – and reports stress the fact that these criminals are co-operating with non-eastern European gangs.

Other newspaper stories have included reports on the alleged Jewish kingpin of the "Russian Mafia," Semyon Mogilyevitch, who was involved in the now failed YBM Magnex International. And the murder of a 15-year-old Russian Jewish immigrant by a gang of teens in Toronto has raised the issue of Russian Jewish kids involved in youth gangs and other sorts of delinquent activities.

Many Jews dislike any talk of such issues, whether by non-Jews or Jews. They feel it feeds into anti-Semitism, and also besmirches the reputation of the vast majority of honest Jews, including immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Here are some facts: The crude criminality rate for Jews – the number of convictions for indictable offences per 100,000 people, is higher than the rate for all Canadians, 269 to 173. And the rate for such convictions for Jews is double the Canadian average among juveniles, 98 to 46! So clearly the problem of Jewish involvement in crime is serious!

Oops, I made a slight mistake. While the numbers above are accurate, they are the figures for 1923, not 1999. (If I had current data, the Jewish rates would be far below the Canadian average.)

What is the point? First, a technical consideration. The Jewish criminality back then was less serious than those numbers suggest. When you control for the fact that most Jews were urban, and crime is always higher in urban areas, the adjusted criminality rate for Jews drops dramatically, to a level comparable to or below that for non-Jews. Second, it is likely that official crime statistics in those days were biased against immigrants and the poor, for a variety of reasons. (Some things do not change.)

On the other hand, there was a significant amount of Jewish crime in the 1920s and 1930s, in the major cities of Jewish migration in Canada and the United States. There was juvenile delinquency, as well as organized Jewish crime, and the former would often feed into the latter. Some academic researchers have explored the history of Jewish crime and criminality as part of the integration process. Others have focused attention, with some nostalgia, on "tough Jews." This is also the title of a 1998 volume by Rich Cohen which looks at Jewish gangsters in America.

There has always been a link between immigration and crime, and Jews have not differed from other immigrants: Italian, Irish, Asians, Latin Americans, Jamaican, Africans and others. A host society that wants the immigrant scientists, entrepreneurs, workers, cab drivers and artists will have to be prepared for a small proportion of criminals.

It should surprise nobody that some recent Russian Jewish immigrants, coming from a society where anti-Semitism was rampant, where individual enterprise was discouraged or illegal, and where the government itself – and by implications its laws – was seen as repressive, should have gravitated to crime as an outlet. Much the same was in fact true for earlier generations of Jews suffering under and then fleeing czarist rule.

Jews should be vigilant that the mainstream press does not go overboard on the matter, and terms like "Russian Mafia" should be used selectively and accurately, if at all. Many so-called Russian Jewish criminals may be barely Jews at all, or are, in fact, non-Jews.

At the same time, the organized Jewish community should not shrink from confronting internal social problems. It would do well to channel more resources to guiding younger generations of Jewish immigrants towards a smoother integration where possible. In the meantime, no panic. There is nothing new here, and it will all work out just fine.

Jacob's final lesson

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the next few weeks the Torah portion will conclude the book of Genesis and begin the book of Exodus.

The last patriarch, Jacob, dies and is embalmed in Egypt. Before saying goodbye to this great man, one should reflect on what his final moments have taught subsequent generations.

Questions are often raised about Jacob and his ability to understand parenting and sibling issues.

How much of Joseph's ordeal at the hands of his brothers was due to the seeds planted by Jacob? Was Jacob truly blind to the turmoil he was creating among his children when he favoured one child? Could we conclude that Jacob did not understand the meaning of covenant at all?

It is, perhaps, easy to say that Jacob failed as a father, as a patriarch and as a formulator of covenant. Yet, in his final moments we are overwhelmed by his deep and true understanding of all the issues.

Before Jacob dies he insists on laying claim to Joseph's children as his own. Menashe and Ephraim, Joseph's children, are "owned" and blessed by Jacob. In a scene eerily reminiscent of Isaac's deathbed blessing and the confusion between Jacob and Esau, Jacob, now on his deathbed, crosses his arms to place his right hand on Ephraim, the second born and his left hand on Menashe, the eldest. When Joseph tries to correct him, Jacob simply responds by saying "I know," and in fact, he does.

Negative name

Menashe was named by Joseph with a statement declaring that he has now forgotten the pain of his father's household. It is a negative name. Ephraim's name is declared as one of fruitfulness and wealth. It is a positive name.

Jacob is attempting to balance the two boys by transferring some of the positive onto the negative. He has understood that covenant is about balance and harmony and not about living by extremes.

Shortly afterwards Jacob blesses all his children, some of whom are given positive statements, while others are negative.

When one compares his blessings with their namings at birth, one is struck by the consistency with which the positive and negative images are maintained by Jacob.

Where he is able, he turns a negative name into a positive one. He has tipped the scales ever so slightly, he has tried to give the family whatever advantage he could.

When we bless our children on Friday nights, we likewise reverse the names of Menashe and Ephraim for our sons and Leah and Rachel for our daughters. We bless our children with the hope that they will achieve balance in their lives.

Yet, after we are shown this secret message of covenant, after the portrayal of how deeply Jacob has understood the process, he is sadly embalmed after death. He dies in a foreign land after having lived a difficult and painful life.

Jacob is the patriarch who struggles with every concept and every deed. He is the ancestor who meets and interacts with the angels. He is the one we misunderstand the most.

I cannot help but remember the words of F. Scott Fitzgerald and think of Jacob, our last patriarch: "Show me a hero and I'll write you a tragedy."

Popular challah recipes

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today more on challah and methods to bring the mesmerizing smell into your home.

However special challah tastes these days, it is hard to imagine how it could have tasted a few generations ago. Abraham Joshua Heschel tried to paint a picture: "In the shtetls of Eastern Europe, our ancestors six days a week would eat the coarse, dry, black bread of the peasants, but on Shabbat they would eat challah, a bread of such richness and sublime delicacy, that by comparison it was more like cake than bread: much like the contrast between the six days of the profane week and the holy day of Shabbat." [http://www2.mcjc.org/mjfood/mjfmc005.htm]

Modern challahs pose new problems, especially for people watching their waistline. Challah cannot be considered a low calorie food, but there are ways to create golden loaves that are not brimming with eggs and oil. Dr. Deborah Bernstein's Fat-Free Challah uses egg whites and pear baby food [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/chalfatf.htm] while J. Piscatella's Heart Healthy Challah uses only egg whites or egg substitute and a half cup of oil [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/chalheal.htm]. You may also want to try Rick's Lowered Cholesterol Challah. But note that although this recipe does not use any egg yolks, unlike most challah recipes, it is dairy [http://www2.ios.com/~wordup/bread/challah.html].

Looking for more ideas? Arielle's Recipe Archives have seven variations [http://www.neosoft.com/recipes/breads-yeast/] including one that uses saffron, another that calls for potato water and a challah that has an apple topping. But the bubbie of all sites is the Jewish-Food Challah archives, which includes no fewer than 56 challah recipes, including Almost Like Aunt Leah's, Honey Whole Wheat and Sourdough [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/chlindex.htm].

Challah has caught up with technology (or is it vice versa) and there are plenty of recipes out there using bread machines [http://www.betterbaking.com/baker2/breadmach2cha.html]. But the concession to technology only goes so far. You are instructed to use the machine only for preparing the dough. Bake the challah in your oven.

No challah is complete without the intricate braiding. There are several sites which describe how to braid a challah, such as Empire Kosher [http://www.empirekosher.com/neverfail.htm] and the Food & Wine site [http://www.pathfinder.com/FoodWine/trecipes/789.html]. However, I like the Canadian Living site because it illustrates how to do it [http://www.canadianliving.com/features/food/cookingiesson-challah/cl-challah.htm].

In my next column, I'll look at what to do with your challah after Shabbat is over. But I conclude with Jeff Rosenberg's story of what must surely be the strangest use of a challah ever devised [http://www.radiohazak.com/Tampa.html].

Rosenberg had hot tickets for a Bob Dylan concert that was being held on the Saturday night between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. After Dylan's encore, Rosenberg tossed a round raisin challah onto the stage.

The challah bounced around and finally came to rest near the superstar's feet.

"His eyes met mine, as if asking 'Was that you who threw that?' I spread my arms out and mouthed the words 'Shanah Tovah.' At which point, the man's expression turned from one of amusement, slowly, to something more like humility. And he mouthed the words to me, 'Thank you.'"

Jewish Life

Rabbinic Reflections

A time of promise

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

Although the millennium has been the centre of news for the past few months, it has no specific Jewish connotation. Nevertheless, it is a reminder that we are coming to the end of the 20th century.

There is no doubt that historians will mark it as one of the most significant centuries in Jewish history – we experienced the monstrous Holocaust and the creation of the State of Israel. With all the problems confronting the Jewish people here and in Israel, we still have many reasons to be optimistic about the future.

If this had been written 100 years ago, there would have been a gloomy picture painted of the 20th century. The synagogue then played a very minor role in Jewish community life. Many immigrants were interested in assimilating into the non-Jewish community. Many young people did not relate to their parents, rabbis and Hebrew school teachers, whom they considered old-fashioned.

The outside world did not help because there were so many forms of anti-Semitism and a tremendous amount of discrimination. Jews were unable to secure jobs in many business enterprises.

Who could have imagined that today there would be Jews in the cabinets and Supreme Courts of the United States and Canada, or that Jews would be serving as president of leading universities and CEOs of major businesses.

It is coincidental that the holiday of Chanukah, which we recently celebrated, not only reminds us of the historical, miraculous events of 168 to 165 BCE, but gives us a message and a challenge for today's Jewish world. Jews revolted against the Greek Syrian masters because they imposed restrictions upon the practice of the Jewish religion. The Jewish people were prevented from observing Shabbat, eating kosher, performing brit milah and most importantly, teaching Torah to young children and adults.

The victory against the enemy and the re-dedication of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem saved the Jewish religion from disappearing. It also kept alive monotheism for the rest of the world.

As we approach the 21st century, we should not take the blessings and the freedom that the Jewish people have achieved for granted. There are very few impediments preventing us from living a full Jewish life and being accepted in the academic, professional, government and business world.

Today, Jewish education is still the most important insurance for keeping Judaism alive. While this is certainly necessary for children, teenagers and young adults, it is equally important that we add more adults to the large number already engaged in serious Jewish study. This knowledge will help Jewish families recognize the importance of the synagogue and see it not only as central to the Jewish family but as the inspiration to observe mitzvot, rituals and customs at home.

Time to end an injustice

By WAYNE J. LEVIN
Special to The CJN

It is hypocritical of the government of Ontario, as an educational authority, to teach critical thinking, equality, good citizenship and justice to our youth, yet itself ignore reason and practise discrimination and exclusion.

In fact, it is more than hypocritical, it is quintessentially Orwellian. The very educational authority that incorporates George Orwell's Animal Farm into its curriculum propagates policies where some children in Ontario are more equal than others.

For years, parents of students in independent schools have sought fair funding for their children. They receive no government funding or services whatsoever, despite the Harris government's advertisements and assertions indicating that education funding is now "fair" and that every student is now covered by a "basic, universal" grant.

Independent schools, particularly those that are culturally based, exist because the government does not provide what they need.

However, to the government's credit, they do fund a variety of equivalent programs and schools that ensure broad-ranging alternatives to serve the needs of a diverse student body.

These alternatives provide learning environments that cater to the needs and objectives of a variety of student profiles – and all are funded by taxpayers. But there is no taxpayer support for the equivalent needs of the many independent school students.

Schools do not simply teach subject matter, they develop young people. An education system must therefore provide appropriate environments that encourage and direct students, with their diverse interests, backgrounds and capabilities, to learn best and achieve their potential.

The widening variety of publicly funded programs and schools attest to this fact. But public schools either do not, or cannot, legally provide what many independent school families require.

For these families, independent schooling is as necessary as English as a second language is for immigrant families.

The Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that the Ontario government can fund the education of independent school children. Justice and the government's frequently stated values of fairness demand that it do so.

Recently, Education Minister Janet Ecker ducked the Orwellian concern that some students are more equal than others, expressing instead her belief that there is greater understanding among diverse peoples when kids are exposed to students from a variety of backgrounds in school.

Where is the evidence to support her claim? Why does the minister suggest that funding independent schools is detrimental but funding equivalent public school alternatives is not?

The suggestion that a lack of exposure causes people to be intolerant of minorities suggests that rural Ontario schools must be graduating scores of narrow-minded young adults.

Likewise, we would have to believe that those who espouse racist views could not possibly come from culturally diverse schools.

Separate school students, who have very little exposure to non-Catholics in school, must be exceptionally bigoted, according to the minister's notion.

What independent school parents seek is equal funding, an extension of the Harris government s rair Funding Formula to include their kids.

Such an extension is reasonable since the government is constitutionally mandated to provide for every child's education and graduates from independent schools are readily accepted in vocational schools and universities in Ontario and beyond.

Independent school graduates develop into productive Canadian citizens. Education dollars spent on independent school students, therefore, would be tax dollars well spent.

When justice and reason overcame notions and political ideology, women got the vote.

Independent school parents hope that the Ontario government, the very authority responsible for instilling justice and reason into our youth, will finally deliver equality in funding education in Ontario.

Parents for Educational Choice encourages everyone to meet with their MPP and ask for their help in ending this injustice.

Family resource centre to open in Vaughan

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — One of the first family resource centres in the Greater Toronto Area geared to the Jewish community, is set to have its grand opening on Jan. 16, from 1 to 3 p.m.

The centre, to be located at the Promenade Mall (suite 318) is a joint project of Jewish Family & Child Service, the Bathurst Jewish Centre and UJA Federation.

The goal of the centre, said Bernice Friedman, program co-ordinator, is to "strengthen families, and empower parents in their roles as caregivers, nurturers and providers."

Friedman was trained as a family life educator by JF&CS, and is now pursuing a doctorate in education in the field of curriculum development. "The centre is running on a positive model. Everyone has strengths; we need the opportunity to develop those strengths, meet our potential and flourish," she said.

People can develop their skills by attending workshops and programs, and meeting with other parents she said, adding that a strong attempt will be made to have a special needs component, so that families with special needs can use the services. "A large part of our goal is to make the centre user friendly."

Friedman taught family studies and special education before leaving to raise a family, eventually pursuing further studies.

Some people lose confidence when they become parents, she said. "We know how important it is to empower them and give them the opportunity to meet people in the same position."

The centre, which will offer unlimited drop-in privileges, will also have information on schools and other facilities in the area, a lounge, play area and toys, arts and crafts and story time.

Workshop topics may include infant stimulation, parent/caregiver and child fitness; balancing work and home; fostering early language development; nutrition and health information; couple communication and life cycle transitions.

The place will also serve as a cultural and religious centre, said Friedman.

"We plan on having an advisory board with parents, who will help plan our activities. We have already received a lot of input.

"We are seeking volunteers to run the drop-in, tell stories, put together a newsletter, or do whatever else they may be interested in."

BBYO aids homeless youth

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Youth helping youth is an appealing concept.

This is one of the reasons B'nai Brith Youth Organization's governing board chose Youth Without Shelter as its pet project this year, said Andy Fenyes, the 16-year-old shlichah of BBYO's Greater Toronto Area Council.

Every year, BBYO's GTA Council, which is made up entirely of young people (chapter presidents and elected representatives), chooses a social action project for the programming year ending in June.

Last month, the council chose the 30-bed Youth Without Shelter, which provides emergency shelter and day programs, such as life skill sessions, hot lunches and recreation activities, for homeless youth ages 16 to 24.

The shelter is sending BBYO a "wish list" of needed items, including hygiene products, warm clothing, and small items like TTC tokens, batteries and Band-Aids, said Susan Ezeard, a spokesperson for the shelter.

BBYO has already started collecting goods, Fenyes said.

A pet project like Youth Without Shelter raises teens' social consciousness said Dena Libman, director of development at BBYO.

"It's difficult for teens who are growing up in comfortable, stable homes to realize there are other teens who are living on the streets," she said.

In the fiscal year from April 1, 1998 to March 31, 1999, more than 700 young people, many of whom were victims of abuse, parental abandonment and emotional problems, visited the shelter, Ezeard said.

Nine other youth shelters exist in the GTA.

Hockey night in Canada is coming to Israel via the first ever Israel On Ice mission sponsored by UIA Federations Canada.

Three amateur teams from across Canada are currently being recruited to take part in the mission, March 31-April 9. Qualified participants will be testing their skating and scoring skills in a round robin tournament against members of Israel's senior national hockey team at Canada Centre in Metulla, just prior to their participation in the World Championships in Iceland.

Laurence Goldstein, who is chairing the effort to organize a team from Toronto, says the trip, which costs $2298 per person, is a great deal. "It's a great opportunity to play against Israel's national hockey team and experience the country."

In addition to ice time in Metulla, mission participants will visit historical sites in Jerusalem, Caesarea and Tzfat, swim in the Dead Sea, climb to the top of Masada, take a jeep ride in the Judean desert, hike through the Golan Heights and visit an Israeli Defence base near the northern border.

"The mission is a unique opportunity for Canadians to learn about the strong connection between our two countries," notes Gerry Halbert, past president of UIA. In addition to an Olympic size skating rink and indoor swimming pool, Canada Centre, built with funds raised by Canadian Jewry, houses squash and basketball courts and other modern sports and recreation facilities. Home to Israel's junior and senior hockey clubs, the centre is also the training ground for many of the country's most promising athletes.

"It's a magnificent and magical place where Canadians as well as Israelis can feel right at home," adds Halbert.

Role of sacred garments explored at lecture

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Debates about whether women should wear sacred garments have gone on for centuries, says a professor at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

"The question has been whether these garments are Jewish garments or Jewish male garments," said Sara Horowitz, at a workshop sponsored by Beth Tikvah Synagogue. The workshop is the second in a series about Jewish women in the next millennium.

Sacred garments, such as tallitot and tfillin, represent the covenant between God and the people of Israel, said Horowitz. "Men are firmly ensconced in this covenant, but [the relationship between women and the covenant] is a little blurry."

When we think of people who wear tallitot, we usually think of our fathers or grandfathers, she said. "The images are very male, and women find it difficult to step over the line. It is a father image, not a mother image."

In most cultures, she said, women are more visibly marked than men. "The veil, for example, is a physical marker of Islamic women. In Judaism, however, you can tell a religiously dressed man, but you cannot tell a religiously dressed woman. That kind of marker is more attached to men than to women."

The reference to sacred garments comes from the book of Numbers, said Horowitz. "In it, there is proof as to why Jews wear garments with fringes. It does not specify men, though; it says 'you.' We have to wonder if it encompassed women as well."

The Talmud does say later on that blind people and women are exempt from the mitzvah of wearing sacred garments. "The idea is that blind people cannot see the garment, so the trigger of remembering the covenant is not there. What about women, though? They are not necessarily blind."

Some people have said that women do not need to wear the sacred garments that serve as a trigger for people to remember the covenant, she said, because men should not be looking at women.

The problem with that theory, according to Horowitz, "is that the person wearing the garment should be remembering God; wearing it is not only a trigger for other people.

"Something funny is going on in the text. It forgets that women can see and remember. The logic breaks down."

A question women should ask themselves, said Horowitz, is whether they want to wear tfillin. "If they do wear them, should they be traditional tfillin, or should they be reconceptualized? These are issues we have to think of when we think of women wearing tfillin.

"Maimonides said that women may wear tfillin, but they should not say the prayer when they put them on. He adds, that because women are not commanded to wear them, it is not as great a deed for them.

"Men must do it to fulfil a commandment; women do it because they want to. The Judaic principle is that it is a greater mitzvah to do something that is commanded."

Women who do want to wear sacred garments, said Horowitz, often do so in order to feel included and part of the covenant. "There is so much embedded in it. It is a difficult decision, however, because it means opening a door."

Many customs originated outside of Judaism: TAU prof

Paul Wexler

TORONTO — The symbolic breaking of the glass is a tradition that typically characterizes Ashkenazi Jewish weddings.

But the origin of this custom may not be so Jewish.

According to Paul Wexler, a Tel Aviv University linguistics professor, the breaking of the glass, a Germanic custom that predated Christianity, was meant to scare off the devil, who was thought to enter the north end of churches.

Wexler, the author of two books on the origin of Jews — The Ashkenazic Jews: A Slavo-Turkic People in Search of Jewish Identity and The Non-Jewish Origins of the Sephardic Jews – spoke at Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University's (Toronto office) recent annual general meeting.

In his keynote speech about the origins of Jewish language and customs, Wexler argued that many Jewish traditions have been adapted from other religions and cultures.

In the 13th century, rabbis tried to eliminate the glass-breaking custom – they knew of its pagan origins – but failed, so they gave the tradition a new meaning, he said.

Another example of a non-Jewish custom which became a Jewish tradition is the lighting of a yahrzeit candle. This was a German Catholic custom before Jews adopted it, according to Wexler.

The German word Jahreszeit used to mean lighting a candle in memory of a deceased relative. While the German language has lost this original meaning – the word now means season of the year – there are villages in Switzerland and western Austria where Catholics still practise the custom, he said.

Even challah was not originally a Jewish bread, Wexler noted.

It dates back to a pre-Christian pagan tradition in Germany – girls would cut off their braids at puberty and offer them to Frau Holle, a German witch who supposedly gave these girls protection in exchange for their braids.

Eventually, the girls offered braided bread instead of their braided hair.

Jews renamed this bread after the biblical Hebrew term challah referring to unbaked dough given to priests.

The Magen David was not originally a Jewish symbol either, according to Wexler.

For the last 2000 years, it has been a widespread symbol in Africa, Asia and Europe. In German and west Slavic villages, non-Jews painted this symbol on the floor of barns to protect animals or on the floor or bed of a pregnant woman as a sign of protection.

The Arabs called it the Seal of Solomon; the Magen David only became a Jewish symbol in the late 18th century, he said.

Even Jewish languages can be traced to non-Jews, Wexler said.

Yiddish, Judeo-Arabic and the approximately 22 other Jewish languages introduced in the last 2,500 years were created by converts to Judaism who wanted a language to differentiate themselves from non-Jews, Wexler said.

He pointed out that Jewish languages only developed in areas where there were conversions, such as Germany, Spain, North Africa and the Middle East, while Jewish languages did not develop in areas where conversions were uncommon, such as America, Britain and Canada.

Historic evidence proves mass conversions to Judaism did occur, said Wexler, citing the Khazars – Turkic tribes who lived in Russia and converted to Judaism in approximately the ninth century – as a major example of this mass conversion.

When asked in a later interview why these conversions occurred when Judaism is not traditionally known as a religion that converts people, Wexler responded: "I don't think the Jews tried to convert anybody. It's the non-Jews who wanted to become Jews."

Women urged to get involved

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yael German, mayor of Herzliyah, was here recently with a "loud and clear" message concerning women.

"Women need to have confidence in their abilities, and society needs to be educated about the important roles women can play," said German, who was here as a guest of the New Israel Fund.

In Israel, 1996 statistics show that although over 50 percent of university graduates are women, only 7.8 percent are professors, she said. "Sixty percent of government employees are women, yet they occupy only 10 percent of top level government jobs.

These figures "speak for themselves," she said.

In the 1998 municipal elections, in which German won in a surprise sweep of 31 percent of the vote as a representative of Meretz, 30 women ran for mayor.

"Twice as many should have run. In Herzliyah, I ran against seven men. It takes a lot of guts for a woman to run a campaign. The reaction is often intimidating," said German.

When she announced her candidacy, she said, nobody believed she had a chance. "Until the last day of the campaign, I was given no media exposure.

"While the others were fighting with each other, however, I was working hard. It served me that no one paid attention.

"During the campaign, I spoke to thousands of people, and I knew they were responding to me. When I came first, I was not surprised."

She credits women for bringing her into office.

Yael German

"They had such creative ideas. They were dedicated to the campaign. It took courage for them to put my nomination forward.

"There are so many other able women who have a lot to contribute, but they are intimidated," says German who received the impetus to enter politics after attending a workshop sponsored by the Israel Women's Network (IWN), which receives $205,000 (US) annually from the New Israel Fund.

"Ten years ago, I thought it was wrong for women to do this. I felt it was not humble. IWN told us that it was our duty to do it. They made me feel the strength, the sisterhood. I knew I could do so much more."

Herzliyah, she says, has a diverse population, with 15 percent of the population on welfare, and with many cases of children at risk.

"Many of these families are in the second generation of poverty, and we are trying to find a solution, so they will not have a third generation living in poverty."

Looking back on her first year in office, German said she put a lot of money into education. She had air conditioning installed in many schools, because she claims that children cannot learn properly in extreme heat. She also contributed to a program – the first city in the country to have all children participate – that teaches citizenship, democracy and anti-violence.

"I've just started to visit schools to see how the program is working out. It is not a rosy road. The teachers feel it is something that just landed on them. They had to take lessons and attend seminars. It is important, though."

High school students are beginning to learn about mediation, "a hot topic in Israel. It is the new way of thinking. The moment people start realizing that other people also have a point, they become less aggressive."

Currently, German is completing negotiations with the air force to use part of one of its buildings as a cultural centre.

"I would like Herzliyah to be known for its education and culture.

"I also want the municipality to be more service oriented. We've updated the computer system in the offices, and city employees have taken courses on how to better deal with the public."

Another pet project, she said, is to have a youth centre built, so "kids will have somewhere to go after school. We already have a plan and a budget, and we are now seeking donors, so we can finish funding, and begin to build it."

German was in Toronto as part of the New Israel Fund's Women's Voices series, that also had speakers in Washington, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles. To read about the New York program, hook into the organization's Web site at www.NIF.Org.

Sport-a-thon raises almost $3,600 to aid CF patient

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A sport-a-thon at the Bathurst Jewish Centre organized by the student council of United Synagogue Day School's Bayview campus raised nearly $3,600 to help Lisa Ostrovsky.

Lisa is the 11-year-old Israeli girl with cystic fibrosis who recently received a lung-lobe transplant. Funds are being collected from around the world to help pay for her medical expenses and the living, travel and communication expenses of her family.

Student council co-presidents Rachel Vale and Alex Sherman, both 13, told The CJN that Lisa's plight was one of several causes suggested by teacher facilitator Cherie Sachar.

"We thought it was the most moving, and the one where everyone thought we could be the most help, said Vale.

The two young women presented a cheque to Laurie Berman, who spearheaded the Toronto fundraising effort, during a special assembly held in the sanctuary of Beth Tikvah Congregation.

Berman said the situation proved that "one person can make a difference."

Lisa's father sent an e-mail to a friend explaining about his daughter's deteriorating physical condition, said Berman. "That man contacted another friend, and so on until it went around the world."

Berman said that while they were waiting for a cadaver match, Lisa became so ill, that it was decided to use a lobe from two people who were less than perfect matches. The lung tissue came from her mother, and a non-Jewish man from England, who, horrified by the Holocaust, wanted to do something to help a Jewish person.

While Lisa has had a rocky recovery, Berman reported, she is now off life support and can communicate with her hands.

Sherman said the students from grades 6 to 8 spent half a day last month enjoying basketball, hockey, aerobics, track and swimming. "They each had to give some of their own money, and had to get sponsors," she said.

The student council chooses a different cause to raise funds for every year. Last year, the youngsters raised money for kits of school supplies for children in developing countries, under the auspices of Free the Children, founded by 16-year-old Craig Kielburger.

Ottawa family reunites after 80 year absence

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Shortly before his 101st birthday, Benjamin Feinstein felt the time had come for a reunion with his sister, whom he had not seen for 80 years.

Feinstein was still well and living independently in his own apartment, but he had recently had surgery for a second hip fracture.

"I feel I am going downhill," he told his daughter Ruth, "and I haven't seen my sister. I would like to see her."

Ruth immediately called her cousin Inna in Cincinnati and asked her to bring her mother, Sarra Pyatigorsky, to Ottawa as soon as possible.

What she did not know was that the reunion of a brother and sister who had not seen each other for 80 years would make headlines around the world.

In a recent interview, with Inna acting as interpreter for her mother's Yiddish, Inna and two of her cousins told their parents' story.

When Benjamin Feinstein escaped from Russia to Romania en route to Palestine at the age of 21, he left behind his parents and nine siblings, including his eight-year-old sister, Sarra. Feinstein never made it to Palestine, but after four years in Romania he came to Canada as a refugee.

He first settled in Winkler, Man., in 1924, and spent six years there. Then, with his wife, Frieda, and their two daughters, he made his way to Ottawa and opened a grocery store. In Ottawa, a third daughter and a son were born.

Feinstein maintained contact with his family in Ukraine, and sent money and clothing. The family had lost everything in the pogroms and were grateful for the help.

He continued to support the family until World War II. During the war, his parents, two youngest sisters and several cousins were killed, and two brothers died as soldiers.

Benjamin Feinstein with his sister Sarra Pyatigorsky and her daughter Inna.

Sarra had married before the war and moved to Kiev. When she returned to Odessa after the war, she found it difficult to re-establish her connection with her older brother Benjamin, because their parents, who had been the link, were no longer alive.

Eventually, she did locate Benjamin and they did re-establish contact, but during the Stalin regime, she said, it was dangerous to contact anyone in the West.

Nine years ago, when restrictions were finally lifted, two of Feinstein's daughters, Miriam and Pearl, visited the family in Kiev, but their father was unable to make such a long trip.

Pyatigorsky was over 80 and had suffered a heart attack, but she left her homeland five years ago and moved to the United States to be with her daughter Inna and her family. Inna's brother had emigrated a year before and the family wanted to be together.

Now they were closer to Feinstein, but, as refugees in a new country, the Pyatigorsky family waited a couple of years before they let their Ottawa relatives know where they had settled in Cincinnati.

Then Benjamin broke a hip and his recuperation took some time.

After the emotional reunion of the siblings in time for Feinstein's birthday, Inna expressed Pyatigorsky's feelings, translating for her mother: "There are not enough words to explain how she feels about seeing her brother and his family. It is like a dream."

She was amazed at the large family, the dynasty, her brother had created: four children, 12 grandchildren and 19 great-grandchildren.

When they last saw each other 80 years ago and a world apart, they could never have dreamed of where and when they would next meet, Inna said.

Ottawa Jewish leader killed in car crash

BY DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Lawrence Greenberg, a member of the large and prominent Greenberg family, died suddenly on Dec. 12, a victim of a tragic head-on collision on Highway 7 in Carleton Place. He was 54 years old.

Obituary

A native of Ottawa, Greenberg was well known and respected by the Jewish community for his lifelong involvement in various causes and organizations. From 1995 to 1997, he was the president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir.

"It is devastating to have lost him so suddenly and he will be sorely missed by so many," said Mitchell Bellman, executive director of the Vaad Ha'Ir. "It is a very sad day for the Jewish community and for everyone who knew Lawrence and worked with him."

"His experience, his insights and his personal input will be missed," said Rabbi Arnold Fine, who led the funeral services.

There were so many people in attendance that there was standing room only, even in the second room of the funeral chapel where people viewed the proceedings on closed-circuit television.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka also spoke of his long association with Greenberg. "The governing ethos in everything he did was compassion for every member of the community," he said.

Greenberg was involved in Minto Construction, the family business started by three of his uncles and his late father, Louis. One of the founders, his late uncle Lorry, was a former mayor of Ottawa.

Lawrence was the eldest of numerous first cousins, many of whom are also involved in Minto. Roger Greenberg, president of Minto, the largest home builder in the Ottawa region, said his cousin Lawrence had recently reduced his workload to spend more time with his family.

Of his cousin, Roger Greenberg said, "The amazing thing about Lawrence was that he had no airs or pretensions. He did things in as quiet and efficient a manner as possible. He also had a tremendous sense of people, of sizing up people. He was very much a people person.

"Lawrence was looked upon by his many cousins as being the link to the first generation, yet he was very contemporary. Next to his family, being Jewish and being involved in the Ottawa Jewish community gave him his greatest feeling of accomplishment."

Greenberg is survived by his wife Lynda, who was injured in the collision, his son Lee and daughter Hayley, as well as his brother David.

War crimes act introduced

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — A new Canadian Crimes Against Humanity Act, which would revive the option of criminal prosecutions against war crimes suspects and crimes against humanity suspects, was introduced recently. (CJN, Dec. 16)

Among its key provisions:

- It would not be a defence to say that an offence was committed in obedience to the law in force at the time. The defence of following orders could not be based on a belief that an order was lawful, except in certain circumstances as provided in the legislation.
- Sentences and parole eligibility rules that would apply to a conviction for genocide, crimes against humanity or war crimes involving an intentional killing would be the same as for murder in the Criminal Code.

Plans launched for a Canadian Jewish university

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

HAMILTON — A move to establish a Canadian Jewish University that would ordain Orthodox rabbis in Canada for the first time has been launched by Maimonides College.

With a charter issued by the Ontario government in 1969, the college currently offers some classes in Toronto. It is planning to have campuses in both Toronto and Hamilton, the former depending on a land purchase and community support.

Maimonides' first campus will be located at the Yeshiva Beit Yitzchak secondary school in Hamilton on the site of a former public school near the large, Orthodox Adas Israel Congregation in west Hamilton. Proponents of the college obtained the site 10 years ago.

Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz, educational director of Ohr Somayach in Toronto, was recently appointed rosh yeshiva of Yeshiva Beit Yizchak and of Maimonides College, the yeshiva's senior beit hamidrash.

Rabbi Breitowitz, who received his ordination from Ner Israel Rabbinical College of Baltimore, has served Jewish communities as an educator and administrator for almost 20 years.

Alvin Meisels, executive director of Beit Yitzchak, expects that next fall, 30 post-secondary rabbinic students will be enrolled at the Hamilton campus, which has a residential dormitory for 200, including its yeshiva students.

The moving spirit and president of Maimonides College is Rabbi Mordechai Green, 65, of Adas Israel, who in 1962 supervised the building of the new synagogue, the Hamilton Hebrew Academy Day School with 190 students, and a mikvah on the same property.

"A love for learning and a joy for Torah living is the essence of the new college and the yeshiva," said Rabbi Green.

The yeshiva, which is only a 10-minute walk from McMaster University, offers a full Ontario high school curriculum.

Maimonides College, which already has authority to issue bachelor's, master's and doctoral degrees in Judaic studies, has established classes in education, psychology and Judaic studies for 25 women in Toronto. Its classes there are held at the B'nai Brith Canada building on Hove Street.

The neshamah (soul) of the Canadian Jewish people will not be complete until Judaic subjects at the university level are available, he added.

The controversy surrounding topics such as cloning and genetic studies illustrates that science needs a moral centre that can be met by Judaic studies, he said.

Since arriving in Hamilton in 1959, the Montreal-born rabbi has been working with others to build an Orthodox infrastructure here.

Initial plans call for an administrative and academic campus in Hamilton at the Yeshiva Beit Yitzchak site and an academic campus in Toronto.

The gothic-like yeshiva on Bowman Street in west Hamilton will be an important cog in the Maimonides College wheel, he feels.

The school already has a beit hamidrash (main study hall and library) in an airy space redecorated with stained glass windows and, a mahogany Ark from the original Adas Israel synagogue on Cannon Street in downtown Hamilton. Both the windows and the Aron Kodesh had been kept in storage for more than 30 years.

The yeshiva has classrooms on two floors and an addition built seven years ago with a dorm of 45 rooms on three floors, each floor with commodious washrooms and showers, a dining hall, a well-equipped kitchen, a gymnasium and common rooms.

One of the busiest places at the yeshiva is the Internet room where students, under supervision, can surf the Net on a dozen new computers and write e-mail letters to their families.

Across a driveway from the 5½-acre yeshiva property are six new townhouses for faculty, four of which are occupied. Another six homes for faculty are to be built.

Canadian Jewish Congress opens new office in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A reception to mark the opening of Canadian Jewish Congress' new national office was held on Dec. 12.

Senior Jewish community leaders from across the country were in Ottawa for meetings of the United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC) and many attended the reception before departing for home.

CJC national president Moshe Ronen welcomed the attendants; among them were community leaders from the Ottawa area.

"We are off to a great start here in Ottawa," said Ronen. "This is really a continuation of our work which I hope we can do even more effectively.

"We have moved our best professional staff here; we have a great volunteer core here as well; and we are within sight of Parliament Hill."

David Goldstein, president of UIAFC, congratulated CJC on its new premises and on its ability "on behalf of all Jewish Canadians to advocate what our rights and interests are. This will be a better platform to do this."

Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray attended the reception as well. "I think you have made a wise decision," he said. "So many national organizations have decided to move from other places to Ottawa.

"I am sure this will be very useful for Congress and for the Canadian Jewish community. I am pleased to help you welcome community leaders from across Canada."

Almost everywhere, Jews had no right to citizenship

Indeed, outside of rebellious Judea, Jews were usually well treated in the many lands ruled by Rome. Even the three individuals most responsible for the wanton slaughter in Eretz Yisrael – Vespasian, Titus, and Hadrian – proved themselves, as emperors, to be surprisingly benevolent towards the Jews in the Roman Diaspora.

Roman citizenship was not withheld from Jews, and Jews usually enjoyed security and virtual equality. Romans hardly ever tried to impose their pagan religion onto others, and if they despised Christians, it was not because they sought to convert Christians but more because Christians tried to convert them.

The empire did, in due course, adopt Christianity, and the position of Jews then deteriorated. But the situation was not nearly as atrocious for Jews at that time as it became a thousand years later.

Similarly, in Babylonia, which in due course would be the main centre of Jewish life and activity, conditions for Jews would be much more favourable at the beginning of the first millennium than at the end.

Persians who believed in Zoroastrianism conquered Babylonia in the middle of the millennium, and instituted anti-Jewish regulations and persecutions.

When Arabs occupied the land in 640, conditions for Jews much improved, but by the end of the millennium new Persian invaders severely undermined the economy, instituted fresh religious persecutions, and induced many Jews to leave for other lands. These Persians were Muslims, but of the Shiite persuasion, and they persecuted not only Jews but also those of the local population, who were Sunni Muslims.

In the year 1000, in contrast to the era of Roman citizenship, Jews almost everywhere had no right to citizenship. There were some exceptions, mainly in Muslim lands, notably in Spain and Portugal.

But by the middle of this millennium Christians had conquered the entire Iberian Peninsula, and from then on Jews had no rights at all in these two countries, not even the right of residence.

Jews Were Without Rights

In the early centuries of what we now call the second millennium, not all countries followed the legal concept of citizenship, and in most Muslim lands the concept hardly existed - not for Muslims, and not for Jews.

In Christian countries, the concept did exist, but it did not apply to Jews; they had no citizenship and no inherent rights at all, and this condition remained in effect until well into the second half of the millennium.

Sometimes they were allowed to live in peace, and to earn a livelihood and to practise their religion unmolested, but they usually had no security and no recourse to the protection of the law.

To overcome this state of "rightslessness," Jewish communities appealed to the ruling authority for a charter. Often, they were refused, but over the centuries hundreds of such charters were indeed issued – by emperors, kings, bishops, feudal lords, or city councils.

Some of these documents are still extant, or their content is on record. The oldest known to us was granted by Louis I, Holy Roman Emperor, in 820.

His father, Charlemagne, had founded that empire 20 years earlier, and he had deemed the Jews to be a valuable element among his subjects. The son, Louis, later known as Louis the Pious, gave formal expression to this high assessment of Jews by issuing his charter.

It was directed to specific Jews named therein but in practice it applied to all Jews of the empire, and that empire encompassed most of what we today call France, Germany, Switzerland, and Northern Italy.

This particular charter guaranteed not only protection and certain rights, including the right to practise Judaism, but it even went so far as to prohibit Christians from attempting to convert to Christianity any slaves owned by Jews. (In those days it was quite usual for affluent persons, Jewish or non-Jewish, to own slaves.) The charter also provided for inducements to encourage Jews from other lands to move into the empire.

In the next few centuries, many other such charters followed, none quite as favourable as this one. As we move further into the new millennium, the deteriorating position of European Jewry is reflected in the provisions laid out in successive charters.

Some charters remained in force beyond the lifetime of the issuer, while others expired or were disregarded. In the case of the Holy Roman Empire, authority in such matters gradually passed to local rulers, and Jews had to keep asking for fresh charters.

Their right of residence, and even their right to life, depended on such charters, and on the whims of those who issued them or refused to issue them. All this demonstrates how precarious was the life of the Jew at this time.

There were also many instances where an existing charter was violated or abrogated.

In 1084 the Bishop of Speyer, a city in the Rhineland, issued a charter which, incidentally, alludes to the exposed position of the Jews in Christian Europe.

It specifically permitted Jews to build sturdy walls around their property so as to protect themselves from attacks by unruly mobs. Another interesting clause in that charter permits Jews to sell to Christians any meat slaughtered by a shochet, if it is ruled ritually unfit for Jewish consumption.

Just after 1200, Henry III of England issued instructions to his customs agents that Jews are to be accorded every encouragement to move into England, but no Jew must be allowed to move out of the country unless there was documentation that all his possessions had been conveyed to the king.

This was in keeping with the widespread outlook of West European kings in that era that Jews were the property of the ruler, to be squeezed for funds in every way possible.

In due course, having been squeezed dry, Jews were of little value to the ruler, and were consequently expelled. The expulsion from England occurred in 1290, from France in 1390, and from the smaller jurisdictions in Western and Central Europe on various dates throughout this era.

After an expulsion from a smaller jurisdiction, Jews were usually allowed to return years later, if and when their absence made itself felt commercially; in many cases, they were subsequently expelled again.

The greatest expulsion, in 1492, was from Spain, but in that saga the Jews had not been impoverished. For centuries before the Christian conquest, this had been a Muslim land, and Jews had built up a strong economic foundation.

Homage paid by Roman Jewry to Emperor Henry VII, Rome 1312. The hats were typical of those worn by the Jews.
[From the Codex Trevirensis, 1881]

How many Jews were there, and where did they live?

Demographics are at times mysterious, and this is especially true of Jewish populations. It is estimated that in the year 1,000 there were 1,800,000 Jews in the world. Sixteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem, in the year 70, the Roman emperor Claudius had ordered an empire-wide census, and the figures indicated that five million Jews lived in the empire. If nearly another half-million lived outside the empire – mainly in Babylonia and Persia – then we have an approximate Jewish population approaching six million.

It is estimated that one million – mainly civilians – perished in the wars against Rome. It thus follows that to the end of that millennium Jewish population declined by 60 percent, not counting war losses. This was over a period when the general population remained roughly even.

After the year 1000, Jewish population apparently continued to decline, reaching an estimated 1.5 million by 1600, and in these six centuries the world's general population increased. Perhaps these declines are the result of substantial shifts of Jewish population from place to place, but we cannot know for sure.

In the year 1000 close to half of the 1.8 million lived east of the Jordan, mainly in Iraq, the new name for Babylonia, and Persia. Both these centres were then in a state of decline, and by the year 1000 over 400,000 had already settled at the far end of the Mediterranean, in Iberia, Morocco, and Algeria. Other communities lived in France, Germany, Italy, and Byzantium, each of which had less than 100,000 Jews.

The division into Ashkenazim and Sephardim was in process at this time, and we are puzzled to find that the above figures appear to indicate that 80 percent of Jews, at that time, would fall under the heading of Sephardim, against only 20 percent Ashkenazim.

Nine centuries later, just before the Holocaust of World War II, the statistics were the reverse. At that time about 80 percent were Ashkenazim. There must be some factors at work which are not clear to us.

Another intriguing phenomenon is the rapidity of Jewish growth in Easterm Europe at a later date. In the year 1000 the Jewish population of Poland, Romania, Russia and the Baltic countries was negligible, and it remained that way for several more centuries. In 1880, at the onset of mass migration to the West, these countries aggregated about 60 percent of the world's Jewish population.

How was Jewish religious life different from today?

The framework of the siddur was already in place when the current millennium commenced, but several now-familiar parts were absent.

Among these are Adon Olam, Yigdal, L'chu N'rananu, L'cha Dodi, Ma'oz Tzur, Birkat Hachodesh, B'rich Sh'meh, the last parts of Sh'moneh Esreh and Birkat Hamazon, and Yizkor – to mention only a few.

The Passover Haggadah was considerably shorter then, there were less festival piyutim (liturgical poems) in the machzor, and the Selichot services and kinot for Tisha b'Av were not yet formulated as we know them. The festival of Simchat Torah, with all its special customs, was not yet instituted.

Marriage customs were quite different, and the ritual and celebration of bar mitzvah did not yet exist. The institution of paid rabbis was rare, and the professional chazzan was non-existent. Nor did the congregation usually appoint a baal koreh to read the Torah portion, paid or unpaid; in most cities the person who was called to the Torah read his own portion, and was expected to know precise cantillation.

On the other hand, the custom of translating the Torah-reading into Aramaic by an appointed translator was still widely in vogue, especially in eastern countries, although the practice gradually fell out of favour.

It was a common practice in this era for a learned congregant to deliver a sermon during the Shabbatservice. This custom fell into disuse in later centuries, but in modern times it has been reinstituted in many congregations.

The synagogue served as the forum for all announcements including, in some cities, announcements of a business nature. In some cities, the rabbis or congregation officers had the power to impose penalties for infractions of community regulations.

In Christian countries, the government or the church would instruct the congregation on what announcements were required to be made that week in synagogue. These announcements could be directed either to Jews only or to all inhabitants.

For non-Jews, the mandatory promulgation was to be made in the market place; authorities other than the priests themselves refrained from intruding into the church service.

But such inhibition did not apply to the synagogue service, and Jews had no choice but to comply. There were indeed occasions when Jewish congregations were forced to hear sermons in synagogue by Christian clergymen, and the purport was always to encourage conversion to Christianity.

In Iraq, the Jewish academies of learning were in decline at the turn of the millennium. The ancient schools of Sura and Pumbedita had just closed, and their activities were transferred to Baghdad, the new capital of Iraq.

The trend was downward, and Iraq never again attained the glory of its earlier heyday. In the number of Jews, it still exceeded all other countries, but that number was diminishing, and so was the pre-eminence of its learning status.

New Torah centres were springing up in other lands, especially Spain, France, and Germany, and this was the exception to the broad downtrend worldwide. The state of Jewish intellectual activity was in upswing, despite the decline in Iraq.

This growth applied to talmudic studies, and, in the lands of the Western Mediterranean, and later also in Egypt, it applied likewise to the fields of philosophy, science, poetry, grammar, mathematics, and other disciplines.

Spain was the high-point of all this activity, and, indeed, that peninsula, so long as it was ruled by Muslims, moved counter to the wider downtrend in all the aspects previously described, not only in talmudic activity.

Saint Dominic: The Destruction of the Books*, depicted in the fifteenth century by the Spanish painter Pedro Berruguete. Jewish books were commonly burned by Christian zealots.

Religious divisions have been a feature of Jewish life throughout our history. Today we have Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform. A thousand years ago the conflict was between mainstream Judaism – not yet called Orthodox – and the Karaites.

The Karaites observed only the commands enumerated in the Torah itself, and denied the validity of rabbinic teaching. The schism broke out just before the turn of the millennium and the polemic on both sides constituted a major feature of Jewish life at the time. At one stage the question of which movement would prevail was in doubt. But Orthodoxy won out, and today Karaites are only a tiny splinter group.

How was it to live as a Jew then?

In the Christian countries, life was hard and hazardous, and it became harder and more hazardous as the new millennium progressed.

A few centuries earlier, Jews had been allowed to earn a living in agriculture and in all the usual occupations. They excelled as government administrators and as merchants.

But around the turn of the millennium, restrictions were gradually imposed which forced them off the land and out of several professions and many avenues of commerce. They had to limit themselves to moneylending or dealing in used clothing, and to a curtailed list of other occupations.

Moneylending came to be the main source of income. Christians were not permitted to lend money to other Christians for interest, and were hardly willing to lend without interest.

People of all economic levels needed to borrow money on occasion, so here was a niche for Jews to fill. But moneylending breeds hostility, and this occupation thus added to the disdain for Jews felt throughout Christendom.

And when Jews succeeded in accumulating wealth the authorities invariably imposed special taxes, which in effect confiscated their earnings.

In due course, demeaning regulations were enacted which required Jews to wear distinctive clothing or a recognizable badge. This added to the constant hazard of exposure to ridicule or violence.

Except in some Muslim countries, Jews were not allowed to bear arms. Thus, they were a helpless minority frequently set upon by mobs or armed ruffians.

The mandatory ghetto was not instituted until much later, but in most cities Jews already, at this time, lived in a tight Jewish section or a Jewish street.

This Jewish quarter, where possible, was situated near the castle of the bishop or feudal lord, so that in case of attack, the community could seek refuge there.

Jews expelled from any locality suffered the agonizing experience of travelling through unknown, often hostile, lands, or over treacherous seas at the mercy of cruel ship captains.

Finding a place that would allow Jews to settle, and build a new life with a new language and unfamiliar customs, constituted a daunting challenge. And in most cases the expelled families set out with the most meagre of means. Survival usually depended upon help from Jewish communities en route, but these could be far apart.

False accusations repeatedly cost Jewish lives

Each Jewish community had its mikvah, and every meal was preceded by the washing of hands. These hygienic practices set Jews apart from the surrounding population.

In much of Europe, rivers are frozen, or at least too cold for bathing during most months of the year, and there were no other facilities for bathing.

When major plagues or small-scale epidemics broke out, it was noticed that among Jews the number of victims was far fewer. So the word spread that the Jews had poisoned the wells or otherwise deliberately caused the calamity. A frequent consequence was mob violence against Jews, or even judicial executions.

Another oft-repeated calumny made its first appearance in 1144. In the English city of Norwich, a Christian child was found dead just before Pesach. Jews were accused of having murdered him so as to partake of Christian blood at the Pesach seder.

This specific type of slander became known as blood-libel, and many Jewish lives were lost as the accusation was repeated at various times and various locations. The dead child was instantly proclaimed a saint by the local church, and a shrine in that locality then became an object of pilgrimage.

Pilgrims bring money, so there was financial incentive for spreading this libel again and again.

The Muslim world was far less hostile to Jews, and persecutions and expulsions were comparatively infrequent. Whatever restrictions existed applied not specifically to Jews, but to all non-believers. There were, in fact, instances when the Christian religion was singled out for more severe restrictions, and this was partly because Christians sought to convert Muslims.

The Pact of Omar, which had set out the rules governing non-believers, provided for an array of measures to keep them at a lower status. Its regulations included distinctive clothing, prohibition against building new houses of worship, demeaning social treatment, and higher taxes. In practice, most of these rules were hardly ever implemented except for the higher taxes.

One specific hazard threatened Jews in both the Christian and Muslim areas of the world. The records indicate that a major cause for Jewish charity at that time was pidyon sh'vu'im, redemption of prisoners. Sea pirates and highway kidnappers abounded, and Jews were earmarked as likely targets.

When a non-Jew was captured, the captors would be able to collect ransom only if they located his family and his family had the financial means.

Nobody else was willing to pay the price. But if a Jew was captured, the captors could approach a Jewish community anywhere, and they would pay the ransom.

There was a roughly fixed rate of ransom prices, and this type of piracy was in fact a sophisticated business. Governments, when they could, taxed the ransom fees, and thus had little incentive to root out the perpetrators.

Jews knew that by paying such ransom they were encouraging the crime, yet in each case they did whatever was needed to free the Jewish prisoners who were at that moment in hostile custody.

For us who live in today's tolerant and secure society it is hard to visualize the conditions under which our ancestors lived for century after century.

Drildzer Congregation and Society marks 65 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Drildzer Congregation and Society, formerly known as the Drildzer Young Men's Society, recently celebrated its 65th anniversary with some of the initial founders and their second, third and fourth generations.

The banquet and installation were held recently at the Beth Radom Synagogue.

The first group of Drildzer men began meeting informally in the early 1900s and formed a society in 1934.

Turn-of-the-century members were honoured – Chamele Bleeman, Itzchak Schwartz, Meyer Wienstein, Moishe Kirshenbaum, Anziel Birenbaum, Beryl Dovid Hoflazer, Yiddle Bliman and Machel Eisen.

In 1934, when the group of younger men took over the landsmanshaft, they added the name Young Men's to the society. Of the group of 10 men who spearheaded that new group 65 years ago, Jack Stopper, and Jack Bliman were at the dinner.

Debbie and Ron Cowitz, daughter and son-in-law of Jack Bliman, and granddaughter of founder Yiddle Bliman, presented certificates to Stopper, Bliman, and other members who participated in the activities of the organization over the years.

Sol Zigler was elected president. He said the banquet was "a joining of the past and the present."

He credited Mae Waese, the daughter of the late Joe Rutman, one of the founding members and a past president, "who answered the call in a very positive way."

He said that Waese undertook the job of bringing in younger members to the board and assisting with the reorganization.

Waese, who was elected vice-president, served as master of ceremonies.

"When I look at the pictures on the walls at the Drildzer building on Wilson Avenue, I see many of our parents, grandparents and for some of you here this evening, great-grandparents," said Waese. "I am deeply moved by the legacy that is being passed on to us."

Referred to as "Mr. Drildz," Stopper, who chairs the shul committee, also spoke of passing the reins on to the younger generation.

"The Drildzer has played an important role in so many lives and can continue to do so in yours," he said.

"You have stepped forward and will help us keep what we have all worked so hard to create and maintain. Only with a commitment from you, the next generation, will the Drildzer Society be able to continue and prosper."

Ronnie and Sam Hoffer installed the new board. This is the first time in the organization's history that the Drildzer's slate of officers includes females.

Officers of the slate are: Jack Silverman, immediate past president; Zigler, president; Waese, vice president; Sid Greenberg, secretary, and Willie Silverman, treasurer.

Other committee members include, Max Hain, Harvey Golombek, Jerry Morris, Burney Bongard, Debbie Cowitz, Jack Stopper, and Rochelle Sufrin.

Goat Cheese aims to unite Jewish students

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Chayim Newman moved here from New York last year, he noticed a disturbing phenomenon among Toronto's university students.

Few of them seemed excited about organizing Jewish campus events, and attendance at both on and off-campus programs was poor, he said.

The University of Toronto student said he also noticed polarization – many young people joined organizations according to their religious affiliation and did not integrate with Jews of other denominations.

This was a stark contrast to the display of Jewish unity he had seen at the Moshav Band concerts he attended almost weekly during the year and a half he spent in Israel at various yeshivot.

Newman remembers young people from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, yeshivot and other Israeli programs, all dancing and singing together at those concerts.

The Israeli band was formed three years ago "to create original music as well as to carry on the tradition of Rabbi Shlomo [Carlebach]'s music and teaching," according to a Moshav Band Web site.

The band's concerts in Israel also made an impression on Jesse Kaufman, a 21-year-old York University student.

"I left the Moshav Band concert and thought Judaism is cool…I was so pumped up and excited and I wanted to bring that here," he said.

So, Newman, Kaufman, U of T student Ari Greenwald, and a group of their friends organized a concert to bring this band to Toronto students.

The idea was to "get Jewish kids out – hanging out with other Jewish kids – it doesn't matter where you're from or what your background is," Kaufman said.

More than 500 students attended the March concert in the downtown Comfort Zone Bar and Grill.

Because the concert was so successful, the group, which called itself Goat Cheese, decided to coordinate more events.

In deciding on the name, Greenwald explained, they first thought of chevrah (Hebrew for "group of friends"). When they discussed the word, someone noted the similarity to chèvre (French for "goat") – and Goat Cheese was chosen.

The group has succeeded in arranging two more fun programs that brought together Jewish students of different religious backgrounds, Kaufman said.

"If you come to our events, you'll see everything from people with black kippot and tzitzit hanging down to totally secular [people]."

During Sukkot, the group ran a Middle-Eastern-style program called Hookah in the Sukkah.

"We wanted to do something fun on Sukkot," said David Rosmarin, a group organizer and York student.

While most sukkot have "corny Ashkenazi stuff" like fruit on the walls and paper links, their sukkah had carpets and offered free beer and what Rosmarin described as "natural, safe tobacco" smoked in a hookah (a tobacco pipe).

More than 200 people came to the sukkah behind the Chabad-Lubavitch of Markham in Thornhill.

Music was played outside the sukkah and it was a very relaxed atmosphere, said Rachel Singer, another Goat Cheese organizer.

For the group's Chanukah program, organizers "wanted to do something wild and wacky. We wanted it to be a draw," Kaufman said.

On Dec. 4, they brought the group Inasense to the Opera House on Queen Street.

On the site www.inasense.com/, a San Diego writer and musician describes Inasense's sound as "part Grateful Dead, part Los Lobos, part Allman Brothers, blended with mighty, mighty Middle Eastern/Latin percussion."

Before the event, organizers gave out over 500 free promotional CDs. At the concert, they gave out menorahs, candles, dreidels and a zine they made which included information about Chanukah and Goat Cheese. Participants lit Chanukah candles and said Havdalah.

Goat Cheese has about 40 active members but does not have an executive board or job titles – anyone who wants to can help co-ordinate events.

One of the group's goals is to encourage students to help plan events instead of just attending them, Rosmarin said.

At many organizations for young Jews, it is "paid professionals that call the shots," and thee bureaucracy is almost intimidating, he said.

According to Goat Cheese members, the group aims to provide a student-run, non-denominational alternative to these types of organizations.

"Being students, we know what's fun and cool. We know how to reach our age group. We're in contact with students constantly," Kaufman said.

"We're a bunch of students with no agenda. Come out have a good time and be proud to be Jewish."

Fellowship applications available

Applications are now available for the 2000 Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel.

The fellowships, now in their 14th year, offer an opportunity for 26 students entering Grade 12 to spend five weeks in Israel this summer.

Fellows will be chosen on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities.

In the competitive selection process, merit, not financial need, is the standard for selection.

While living in Jerusalem and travelling throughout the country, Bronfman Fellows participate in seminars and dialogues with a diverse rabbinic faculty, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives.

They explore Jewish text against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs and meet with some of Israel's prominent political, cultural and literary figures to examine contemporary issues in light of Jewish history and tradition.

In addition, for the third year, The Samuel Bronfman Foundation will sponsor a parallel group of Israeli high school students, called Emitei Bronfman. This is done in co-operation with Mifgashim, a program of Charles R. Bronfman's CRB Foundation, which for the past four years, has been creating joint educational programming for Israeli and Diaspora youth.

The Israeli Fellows, who, like their American counterparts, will be chosen after a rigorous selection process and represent a cross-section of contemporary Israel society, will have their own educational programming as well as a week-long encounter with the American Fellows.

The Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel is a program made possible by Edgar M. Bronfman and Charles R. Bronfman through The Samuel Bronfman Foundation, Inc.

The staff and rabbinic faculty include Americans and Israelis associated with different movements and perspectives within Judaism, each of whom is closely involved in the selection of Fellows and development of curriculum. All of them either live in Israel or have spent long periods there and have extensive experience working with young people.

The Bronfman Youth Fellowship program begins on June 26, 2000 with a two-day seminar in New York City. The students return from Israel on Aug. 2. All meals will be kosher, and group activities on the Sabbath will be in keeping with the sanctity of the day. All expenses are covered by the program, including round-trip international transportation, room and board, travel while in Israel and incidentals.

High school students in the United States and Canada, who will be in Grade 12 in the fall of 2000, may request an application form and detailed information by mail at The Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel, 163 Delaware Avenue, Suite 102, Delmar, N.Y., 12504; by telephone at 518-475-7212; by fax at 518-475-7207; by e-mail at yfi@bronfman.org or visit our Web page at: www.bronfman.org.

Completed applications must be postmarked no later than Jan. 31, 2000. Finalists will be notified March 1 and finalist interviews will be held during the week of March 12. Fellowship recipients will be notified on March 31.

Candles banned in dorms

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Jewish students at the University of Iowa were not allowed to light Chanukah menorahs in their dorms because of a school regulation preventing students from lighting candles in residence halls.

Some students, however, questioned the regulation, pointing to the fact that the school allows cigarette smoking in the rooms.

Syria is restraining the Hezbollah

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Recent statements by Hezbollah leaders seem to indicate the organization realizes that Syria will increasingly use its influence to restrain it in the build-up to a peace agreement with Israel.

Perhaps as a taste of what is to come, Israeli security personnel believe that Syria used its influence on the Hezbollah to prevent a military response to the shelling of a school by the South Lebanese Army (SLA) last Thursday.

In a talk last Friday at an event in Nabatiyah, Muhammed Ra'ad, chair of Hezbollah's policy council and a member of the Lebanese parliament, said that military opposition to Israel would cease after the conclusion of a peace deal between Israel, Syria and Lebanon, and that the struggle against Israel's regional economic hegemony would begin.

"The resistance, which stood beside the Syrians, will not be abandoned, by either the Syrians or the Lebanese, and will remain within the confines of the strategic struggle against the agency of Zionist industry, by moving from the field of battle to the field of economic hegemony," Ra'ad said.

He claimed that the Israel-Syria talks have resumed on Syria's terms, and "reflect an a priori recognition of Israel's defeat in Lebanon.

"What is transpiring in Washington is not the producing of peace, but rather an arrangement according to the balance of current forces," he said, adding that "the arrangement will not endure forever."

In recent days, the Hezbollah leadership has been claiming that it has no intention of halting its struggle against Israel because of the renewed negotiations.

Recently, Hezbollah Secretary-General Hasan Nasrallah said he would prefer not to stop the organization's activities, but he admitted last week that it was necessary to prepare Lebanese public opinion for future Hezbollah responses to Israeli and SLA military actions.

The Israeli personnel source also pointed to recent Syrian pressure, claiming that if the incident, in which 24 Lebanese schoolchildren were injured, had occurred before the renewal of the Israel-Syria talks, "it's fair to assume that Hezbollah would have made a hasty response that included Katyushas."

But "when Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara is in Washington and Hezbollah wants to preserve its room to manoeuvre in the future, the firing of Katyushas would have caused the organization more damage than benefit."

The source believes that Syria will act to restrain Hezbollah in the coming months, but he emphasized that Syrian tolerance for continued Hezbollah activity in Lebanon is related to progress in the peace talks.

"The moment that [Syrian President Hafez] Assad realizes that he possesses a strategic asset [the chance of retrieving the Golan], his interest in protecting it will be greater than that of using his bargaining chip [Hezbollah attacks in Lebanon]."

Getting to an agreement

A bad agreement would be based on a zero-sum rationale – a gain for one side entailing a loss for the other. A good agreement would negate any incentive for either side to infringe its terms. And it must make reluctance to violate its terms contingent on more than sheer fear of stiff punishment.

The disputed issues on the Syrian track are actually less complicated than the problems which befuddle the Palestinian one. Sound military arrangements would prevent the Syrians (in actual fact, both sides) from being able to launch a surprise attack. Clearly, if the IDF remains in control of cliff areas on the bottom of the Golan Heights, it will be better positioned to forestall any such surprise attempt.

As former IDF chiefs of staff, Barak and Amnon Shahak, each in turn, were armed with maps demarcating such an IDF presence in the Golan when they shuttled off to Washington for talks with their Syrian army counterpart. However, the prospects of Israel's remaining in possession of some portion of this cliff area after the signing of a peace agreement are negligible.

It is more likely that the new border will run beneath the slopes of the Golan, with the negotiations setting this line at the international point commonly referred to as the June 4, 1967 border. With Israel retreating to this line, the compensation afforded by the agreement in terms of security guarantees will have to be substantial.

The security arrangements should come in a full package. They should include the demilitarization of the area, redeployment of troops, and perhaps even structural changes in the relevant armies.

It is imperative to remove arms equipment that can be deployed in a surprise attack and in a strike deep into the heart of Israel. Clearly, a land station will be an important mechanism toward these defensive objectives. Reaching a stable agreement depends on installing a satisfactory monitoring system to ensure compliance with security arrangements.

For Israel, the test of a sound agreement will be the viability of such security arrangements, rather than any diplomatic points to be scored by flying an Israeli flag over an embassy in Damascus, or any economic dividends to be gained in deals with the Syrians.

Another vital criterion for judging the merits of an agreement will involve water. The IDF does not view water source issues to be a military problem; nonetheless, such sources clearly constitute a strategic issue for Israel. Allowing the Syrians a share of the water sources in the north would spell a bad agreement. And for Israel, this issue entails a diplomatic challenge, as the Syrians have declared explicitly that their demand to acquire the June 4, 1967 borders includes a share in the Sea of Galilee as part of the deal.

Dismantling settlements is both an unavoidable condition of reaching a peace agreement with Syria and a trauma for Israel, and many sectors of the public will find the prospect too unpalatable to accept. The only compensation that might ease the uproar over evacuating settlements would be comprehensive peace agreements with Arab countries, as well as the squashing of threats posed by Iran and Iraq.

Real peace is not necessarily derived from peace agreements, as our experience with Egypt, Jordan and the Oslo accords proves. Yet, should a peace agreement with Syria set the stage for subsequent peace accords with countries like Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Algeria, it will differ from the peace with Egypt.

Another question awaiting solution is the fate of Lebanon. Will understandings agreed to between Damascus and Washington clinch Syrian control in Lebanon, or will Syria be compelled to leave Lebanon at some point in the future?

A successful agreement must include a satisfactory set of agreements between Jerusalem and Washington. The negotiation process will thus not exclusively involve Syria. The Americans represent the third side of an agreement triangle, and American commitment will influence a number of factors – the extent to which Israel commands deterrent capabilities in the future, Israel's status in the region, and Israel's ability to withstand the enormous costs involved in withdrawal.

In this connection, the question of whether the time has come for a full-fledged defence alliance between Israel and the United States is sure to be considered. In discussions in Washington, Israel will have to wrest a commitment on the kind of American aid Damascus will get.

Barak should insist that it be primarily economic assistance, lest we see a repeat of our experience with the Egyptians and we end up standing by as the Syrian army outfits itself with brand new U.S. military equipment throughout the next decade.

Duzce journal: helping where an earthquake has struck

This is an excerpt of a journal kept by Alison Epstein, who was sent on a mission by Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Also on the trip were her husband Stephen Epstein, founding president of Ve'ahavta and current board member; Peter Silverman, Ve'ahavta board member and CityTV reporter; and Steve Boorne, CityTV supervising cameraman.

They delivered relief Nov. 21/28 to Düzce, Turkey, which was hit Nov. 13 by an earthquake that measured 7.2 on the Richter scale. It was the second major temblor to hit the northwestern region of Turkey since mid-August.

With $25,000 from Canadian Jewish Congress, Ve'ahavta procured and transported an estimated $70,000 in relief goods, including: pharmaceuticals donated by Apotex Inc.; medications donated and purchased from MAP International; a wheelchair and children's clothing given by the Federation of Canadian Turkish Associations; sleeping bags from Project Warmth; donations from Turkish Radio of multivitamins, throat lozenges and hygiene products; sweatshirts given by Wingson Garments, and clothing purchased at humanitarian prices from Bargains Group.

Tuesday, Nov. 23, 1999

Düzce, population approximately 80,000, is surrounded by farmland. From the highway, we see men and women working together in the field. As we head into town, we pass a tent city set up in a small amusement park. I can't say which looks more out of place, the small ferris wheel or the white tents.

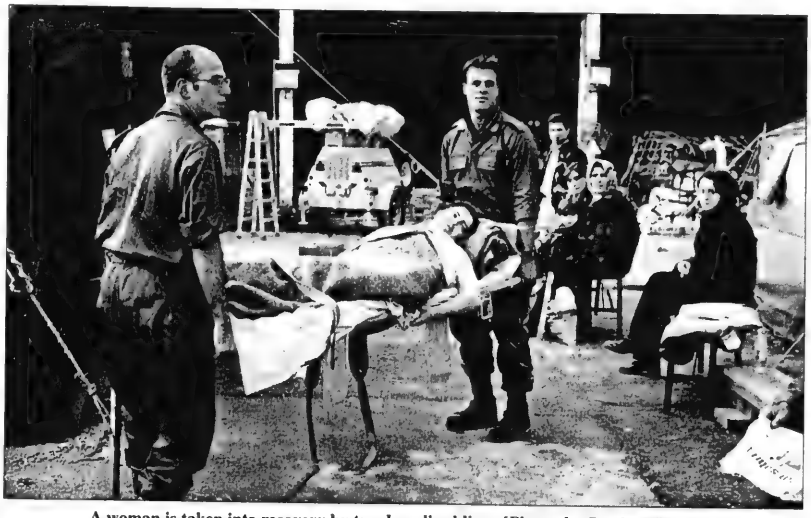
We locate the Israeli army hospital, which is situated in a lumber mill. Huge boards, of what must be cedar, are piled everywhere. The camp smells of spilled fuel.

People have made benches from these planks and sit outside the big green tents awaiting a turn with a doctor. I smile at a young woman holding a baby. A few moments later, a little boy brings the baby to me.

They must think I am a doctor. I take the baby and walk over to the woman. Neither of us speaks the other's language. But there are always other ways to speak. She points to her belly. She is obviously pregnant. I hold up six or seven fingers and point to her belly. She doesn't understand, so I make gestures to show a stomach growing full. And then I hold up six or seven fingers. She shakes her head; she is eight months pregnant.

Naftali Hadas, a lieutenant-colonel with curly white hair, welcomes us to the camp, pointing out such things as the X-ray tent and operating room (OR). Naftali tells us that the ob-gyn unit had to be fashioned from the synagogue tent and that the Torah is now in his tent.

The Israelis came well-equipped in general — satellite phone, fax, Internet. Their Internet access was arranged by Cavit (pronounced "Javid") Onen, a volunteer whose ponytail hangs midway down his back. Cavit has a server in Istanbul and is a reseller of services from Softcom Technology Consulting Inc. which is based, ironically, in Toronto. The soldiers obviously like Cavit immensely. His relationship with the Israelis mirrors the friendship between Israel and Turkey.



A woman is taken into recovery by two Israeli soldiers. [Photos by Stephen Epstein]

The approximately 120 Israelis arrived two days after the quake. At one point, they were told they might stay a month, but they got the word the other day that they will leave tomorrow. The doctors have treated more than 2,500 people in 10 days.

The last surgery is scheduled for around 5 p.m. A woman, whose left little toe is nearly severed off, has bone fragments that need to be removed. In the ER tent next door, doctors treat a Turkish soldier who was hurt when his cook stove blew up in his face. He is not badly burned, but he appears sooty and dazed. It begins to rain as the woman is brought into the OR.

A ledger records the operations performed. Parts are in Hebrew, others in English: septic foot, appendectomy, Caesarian section, remove bone fragments … It had not occurred to me until now that many of the patients had not been injured in the quake. But because the three hospitals in Düzce are badly damaged and/or overwhelmed, there is nowhere else to go.

Earlier, I had asked Naftali what had been the toughest part of this tour. His words come back to me – about a seven-year-old girl brought to the hospital by her father.

The father needed help telling his daughter that her mother, aunt, grandfather and uncle had not survived.

Naftali asked, "How do you tell a child such things?"

He asked one of the local psychologists for help. She spoke to the girl, told her what had happened, took the child to see the new babies in the ob-gyn tent.

The counsellor told the girl that she, too, would be a mother one day and bring life into the world, but that life is a cycle: It begins and ends and begins again. She asked the child whom she missed most, whom she would like to see first. It was Mommy.

The psychologist told the girl to close her eyes so she could see her mother. As the girl's eyes fell closed, a smile came over her face.

Many times that day, Naftali watched the girl squeeze her eyes shut and smile.

Alison Epstein checks the cargo of pharmaceuticals and clothing on the tarmac of the Istanbul airport as it is loaded onto a truck.

As the surgeons begin stitching up the woman's foot, the head of the laboratory comes in to ask if it's OK to start packing up. Before the Israelis turn in, the first two or three tents are down and piled onto pallets. The rain continues to fall.

Tonight, we sleep in the translators' tent. A row of cots lines each side of the barracks. A string of lights and a heater hang from the ceiling. Considering how cold and wet and muddy it is outside, we rest in comfort. It could be much worse and hardly any better.

From the next tent, we hear someone called Jacov snoring loudly. People in our tent alternately complain and giggle, and then someone cracks a joke about it being a lumber mill, after all.

Sleep tight, Düzce.

Anti-Semitic tide rising in Russia

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

During the past decade, a tide of grassroots anti-Semitism has accompanied the renaissance in Russian Jewish life.

In the past few years, this tide has risen, with an increasing number of anti-Semitic statements by lawmakers and high-profile attacks against Jews in the central republic of the former Soviet Union.

Analysis

The reason for this dual escalation: an informal nexus of the Communist party, local governmental officials, the Russian Orthodox Church and the justice and security apparatuses, operating "with complete impunity, sending the message that neither the central nor local government will provide for the physical or political safety of Russian Jews."

That's the conclusion of Anti-Semitism, Xenophobia, and Religious Persecution in Russia's Regions, 1998-1999, a recently released report by the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews, a Washington-based group that monitors anti-Semitism and other human rights abuses in the former Soviet Union.

The study, which is being released just days before the country's Dec. 19 parliamentary elections, details anti-Semitic, anti-Western and xenophobic incidents throughout Russia in the past two years.

"The decision by the Communist-dominated Parliament not to censure Makashov" is a "trigger" for the increase in incidents, said Gideon Aronoff, the deputy director of the UCSJ, referring to the Russian Duma's failure earlier this year to condemn Gen. Albert Makashov, a Communist legislator who made several public anti-Semitic comments.

These incidents include a series of attempted bombings at synagogues and other Jewish locations around the country, as well as the stabbing of a Russian Jewish leader in Moscow.

As a result, the U.S. government has pressed Russia to take a more active stance against anti-Semitism, and the report calls for the human rights push to continue.

We're looking at a "phenomenon that's exhibited in regions across Russia from one end to the other. It's important that the federal authorities respond in word and in deed," said Shai Franklin, the director of governmental relations for the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, who added that the current situation is not the "worst possible scenario" for Jews.

Russian officials have not been totally unresponsive.

A series of measures were taken following the incidents, including adding protection for Moscow Jews at High Holy Day services; and some Russian politicians, notably Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov, have cracked down on extremist forces. Earlier this year, Luzhkov banned a planned meeting by the largest neo-Nazi group, Russian National Unity.

Nor are Russian Jewish leaders all worried about anti-Semitism.

"Anti-Semitism in Russia is not greater than in Europe or America or elsewhere," Levy Levayev, one of the leaders of the newly formed umbrella group, the Federation of Jewish Communities of Russia, said on national television last month.

Russian Prime Minister Vladimir Putin recently met with the leaders of this group, promising to assist the Jewish community in combating anti-Semitism, building schools and reclaiming former synagogue buildings.

But increased security has not been provided at other Jewish sites in Moscow or at Jewish locations in other Russian cities, and many local governments have either ignored or co-operated with the rising tide of anti-Semitism.

The anti-Jewish feeling has intersected with human rights violations and anti-Western sentiment as a result of the absence of laws protecting minorities and a sense that the West, particularly the United States, is taking advantage of Russia's economic and geopolitical weaknesses.

The report cites issues that have created a climate of fear for Jews. Among them:

• NATO's campaign against Serbian aggression in Kosovo led to increased anti-Western sentiment, expressed most fiercely by members of Russia's extreme nationalist community, including the Russian National Unity group. Some 100 members of the group from the Pskov region volunteered to fight NATO troops, according to one report, and leading anti-Semites in the Russian Orthodox Church warned that NATO might attack Russia as well.

• Russia's 1997 religious law curbing freedoms for faiths that have not been registered for at least 15 years. While not directed at Jews, the law has been directed at other religions, including Jehovah's Witnesses, Baptists and Lutherans. In 1998, charges were brought against a Jehovah's Witness congregation in Moscow in an attempt to ban this group's activities there, but the trial was eventually suspended.

"When the local bureau is beating up on Jehovah's Witnesses, the Jews have reason to be concerned," Aronoff said.

The report calls on Russia to rescind this law and introduce legislation in the Duma to restore full freedom of religion in Russia.

• Chechen guerrillas are targeting Jews for kidnapping in the belief that Israel and the international Jewish community will pay high ransoms for them. Current estimates are that about a dozen Jews are held among the 1,000 people being held hostage.

• The war in Chechnya has not only been a "bloodbath" in the breakaway Russian republic, but the war, in addition to a series of September terrorist bombings in Moscow, has exacerbated long-standing prejudices against people from the Caucasus, creating a situation in which dark-skinned individuals in the Russian capital – mostly people from this region – are being "ethnically cleansed from the Russian capital," says Aronoff.

Observers say the war in Chechnya has contributed to the high level of ethnic slurs and incitement in the current election campaign, including a slur by the Nobel Prize-winning author Alexander Solzhenitsyn, who referred to the alleged control of Russian politics by Jewish bankers.

One candidate made a thinly veiled anti-Semitic comment in responding, during a debate to a prominent Muscovite Jew.

"There are people who speak Russian but don't think Russian and don't act Russian," said Andrei Savelyev. "They don't know Russian history, they are not of Russian blood, they are alien to us."

Even more mainstream candidates are sending a strong nationalist message, which historically in Russia has often translated into anti-Semitism.

Whatever the results of Sunday's parliamentary vote, said Lev Krichevsky, the director of the Anti-Defamation League's Moscow office, "the message of ethnic intolerance is being spread freely and constantly to Russian households."

The report is available at www.fsumonitor.com/99report/index.shtml.

Airline agreement

David Cooper, a spokesperson for Israel's ambassador to Canada, David Sultan, who played a key role in the agreement, stressed that the accord is an interim one.

Cooper said both governments want a permanent solution to a problem that has bedeviled them for months, and strained bilateral relations.

Officials from both countries also said Israel backed down because it feared banishment from Canadian skies en route to lucrative U.S. destinations.

Ottawa lobbied hard to be allowed to continue its summer schedule of daily flights to Israel. But Israel wanted Air Canada's winter schedule cut back to four flights a week, charging that the Canadian carrier enjoys an unfair advantage because among its passengers are many Americans.

Air Canada sought – and won – daily flights because it said it was booked solid through 1999-2000, thanks mainly to millennial traffic to the Holy Land.

What started as a commercial dispute quickly escalated into a diplomatic row. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak earlier intervened in favour of Air Canada. He and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien discussed the impasse last month

Earlier this year, Israel inexplicably terminated its 12-year-old air treaty with Canada, leaving a vacuum when it came to rules.

Yarkoni was quoted in the Israeli press last week as saying he expects a permanent agreement to be as liberal as this interim one.

He said even if El Al does not begin flying to U.S. cities, with stops in Canada, right away, it will have the right to develop those routes in the future.

Soldier awaits extradition order

Canadian immigrant. They also say he was visiting his father in Toronto at the time Baranovski was beaten and kicked to death. His mother lives in Tel Aviv.

The Jerusalem Post, however, reported over the weekend that Weiz was back with his army unit at the time of Baranovski's death.

Earlier this year in Canada, Weiz was charged with various offences, including two separate counts of assault. He was sentenced to two, 14-day jail terms. He was also barred from owning a weapon for 10 years.

As a landed immigrant with a criminal record, Weiz should have been deported from Canada, but somehow slipped through the cracks, immigration officials conceded last week.

Weiz had attended the same school as Baranovski did, Northview Heights Secondary School, but dropped out two years ago.

Also last weekend, Toronto police arrested a fourth suspect in the Baranovski slaying, 19-year-old

Remanded in custody

Michael Issariotis. He was remanded into custody and was scheduled to appear for a bail hearing Dec. 22, along with the two 16-year-olds arrested earlier this month, whose identities cannot be revealed under the Young Offenders Act.

During the visit to Toronto earlier this month of Shlomo Ben-Ami, Israel's public security minister, Canadian Jewish Congress raised the question of an Israeli citizen suspected of having taken part in Baranovski's beating death.

Ben-Ami asked for the Israeli's name, but at the time, it had not been released, Congress president Moshe Ronen said.

Ben-Ami's response was, "This is terrible tragedy. We will work with [Israeli Justice Minister Yossi] Beilin."

Ronen said Ben-Ami was ready to block entry into Israel of the suspect, and they also discussed the possibility of extraditing an Israeli to Canada for trial.

Weiz was away without leave from his army unit at the time of the murder, Ronen added.

Chaykin splits time between Toronto and Hollywood

By JOYCE SINGER D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — You may or may not be familiar with the name Maury Chaykin, but it's difficult to go to the movies or turn on the tube without catching this award-winning actor in one of his many roles.

In 1990, after years as a hard-working thespian, his performance in Kevin Costner's blockbuster, Dances With Wolves, essentially put him on the map.

"Because of the success of the film, it put me out there in a way that I had not been before, even after playing major roles in films that had not been nearly as successful," Chaykin says.

Chaykin's accomplishments include winning a 1986 best actor Actra award for Canada's Sweetheart, The Saga of Hal Banks, and two Genie awards, the first in '94 for his insightful starring role in Whale Music, and for a notable '97 guest appearance on La Femme Nikita.

Recent popular flicks include Zorro with Antonio Banderas, Anthony Hopkins, and Catherine Zeta-Jones; and Entrapment, with Sean Connery.

Brooklyn-born Chaykin says, "I was no stranger to Canada." He has dual citizenship, thanks to a Canadian mother and an American father. As a child, he'd visited his grandparents in Montreal, and an uncle in Toronto.

He made his permanent move north of the border in 1974, when he was offered a paying part in a play.

"I was a professional actor in Manhattan for a couple of years, and making nothing. Not being a teen idol, and without an agent behind me, I took the opportunity. I was paid $100 a week to come up here and do a play."

Usually cast as overblown John Belushi-esque left-of-centre characters, rarely does he get the opportunity to just play Joe Average. "The few times I have, it's been very rewarding, simply because it's different," Chaykin confides.

For instance, he and Diane Keaton, a friend whom he describes as an 'interesting combination of power and neurosis, co-starred in Northern Lights for the Disney Channel. She was the executive producer, and Chaykin collaborated with her on the script.

"My character was a real mensch. I played a very normal guy from Ohio, whose acquaintance left custody of his child to me and my sister [Keaton], since he thought I had been a good father to my own daughters."

And being a good father is the most important role in Chaykin's personal life. For Maury and his third wife, actor Susannah Hoffmann, their happiest production has been the birth and nurturing of their nine-month daughter, Rose.

"We don't have a nanny," he admits. "At a certain point it may be a great idea. But for now, the main focus in all my decision-making is, how much time away from the baby is it?"

So Chaykin has found himself playing Mr. Mom, when Susannah has an acting assignment.

For the past five years, they've escaped our harsh northern winters, for their home in the Hollywood Hills.

Maury Chaykin stars in Nero Wolfe on A& E.

This winter, his fans can enjoy him in his latest project, starring in the upcoming A&E mystery Nero Wolfe, scheduled to air in March.

If it's successful we can look forward to Maury/Nero making more frequent appearances on the A&E roster. One way or the other, it's no mystery that Maury Chaykin will continue to expand his repertoire of original characters and memorable mensches.

Documentary on interaith marriage is superficial

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

At a time when mixed marriages are on the rise, Vision TV's Sleeping with the Enemy is particularly of relevance.

The one-hour documentary, a BBC production, will be broadcast on Tuesday, Jan. 4 at 9 p.m.

Before we go any further, a word or two about the title. It is sensationalist and misleading. Do all Christians, for example, regard Jews as enemies? Hardly. There is a place for snappy headlines, but not in a film which purports to be serious.

Sleeping with the Enemy looks at several interfaith couples. Among them is a Catholic and a Protestant from Northern Ireland, a Muslim and an Orthodox Christian from Bosnia and a Jew and a Christian from Britain.

We're also introduced to Angela, a half-Jewish woman whose father was a Nazi in wartime Germany.

Overall, Sleeping with the Enemy is no more than a cursory examination of the phenomenon. We learn exceedingly little about the couples in question.

The Christian-Jewish couple, Hugh and Denise, claim that good communication is the key to a successful marriage. "Talking is the thing," says Denise. "You've got to talk."

Beyond this and other tidbits, Hugh and Denise remain ciphers. The same is true of Northern Ireland's Patrick and Tracey and Bosnia's Vedat and Dijana.

Angela is in a class by herself. Her Jewish mother, passing as a Christian, married a member of the Nazi party after revealing her real identity.

As for Angela, she wed a German Catholic who eventually left her because his parents "didn't see the person… just the Jew."

This segment, too, lacks depth. Many questions are left unanswered.

The best of the year in 'Jewish-themed' videos

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

At this time of the year everyone is releasing their lists of the best films, the best recordings, and so on.

An increasing number of "Jewish" videos is being released every year and 1999 was no exception. This time of year provides a good opportunity to remind ourselves of some of these releases.

Arguing The World (CHV) is fascinating documentary about four leading Jewish thinkers: Irving Howe, Daniel Bell, Nathan Glazer and Irving Kristol. All of them grew up in the New York City area and became leading radicals during the 1930s and 1940s. This film traces the development of their ideas and shows how each one arrived at his own distinctly different point of view in the 1980s and 1990s.

The Governess (Behaviour) is a film that focuses on a young Sephardi woman trying to support herself and her family in 19th-century England. Minnie Driver plays the lead character in a film that varies in quality. On the whole, the film is not very believable, although it does have a wonderful soundtrack that is based on Ladino melodies.

The Harmonists (Alliance) is a recent release that tells the story of a singing group that was very popular in Germany during the 1920s and 1930s. The rise of Nazism forced the group to disband and the three Jewish members of the six-man group had to leave Germany. Although some people may find the music somewhat passé, the film is interesting to watch.

Island on Bird Street (Alliance) is another recent video release. Although it received little or no theatrical release, the video will be of interest to many people. It tells the story of a boy who is left alone in a Polish Ghetto after most Jews have been rounded up and deported. He must survive alone, with only his pet mouse as a companion, while he hopes that his father will return.

Jacob The Liar (Ice Storm) was released on video a few weeks ago. This is the original East German film and was produced on a much smaller scale than the Robin Williams version. It is interesting to watch this film and compare it to the recent remake.

Lansky (HBO) is a biographical film about the infamous Jewish gangster. The film deals very sympathetically with Lansky's Jewish background and the fact that he never lost touch with his roots.

The Last Days (Alliance) is the documentary about several Hungarian Jews who survived the Nazi occupation of their homeland and eventually found refuge in America. Produced by Steven Spielberg's Shoah Foundation, it is an excellent Holocaust film.

Lies and Whispers (Sullivan) is about a love affair that is disrupted by the fact that the woman's grandfather was the war criminal who imprisoned her lover's father and siblings. This film provides a look at guilt and whether innocent people share the blame for their ancestors' crimes.

Minnie Driver in The Governess

Life Is Beautiful (Alliance), the Holocaust parable by Roberto Benigni, finally made its way onto video recently. It is available in both subtitled and dubbed versions.

Madame Rosa (CHV) recently was released on video in Canada, although it has been available in the United States for some time. This classic French film tells the story of an elderly Jewish prostitute who cares for the children of her younger co-workers, and the relationship that develops between her and a young Arab boy.

Passover Fever (Mongrel) tells the story of an unusual Jewish family in Israel that gets together for their annual Passover seder. Gila Almagor is excellent in this film.

Pi (Alliance) is the oddball film about a Jewish mathematical whiz who is trying to decide on the future course of his life, although we aren't sure that he has much of a future.

Pick a Card (CHV) is a recent release. It is an Israeli romantic comedy about two losers who try to achieve their dreams. This film is also known by the name Afula Express and won six Israeli "Academy Awards."

Prince of Egypt (Dreamworks) is the terrific animated film about the Exodus from Egypt and the man who freed the Jews from slavery.

Rescuers: Stories of Courage: Two Families (Paramount) is about two families who risked their lives to save Jews during the Holocaust. The video consists of two separate stories about courage and love and is the third in a series. The previous two videos were released in 1998.

Saint Clara (CHV) is a strange Israeli film about some very unusual characters. The young girl upon whom the film centres has some kind of mental or psychic powers that will disappear when she falls in love.

The Slums of Beverly Hills (Fox) is a coming of age story about a young girl whose father wants her to receive the good education that is available in the Beverly Hills school system, but can't afford to live in anything but the cheapest housing.

A Walk on the Moon (Alliance) is an entertaining story of rebellion and infidelity during the summer of Woodstock.

In addition, there are also a number of films that had strong Jewish characters, such as Tea With Mussolini, High Art, Safe Men, Very Bad Things, 20 Dates, I'm Losing You and The Assistant.

All of these can provide hours of interesting entertainment right in your own home.

Most of the above videos can be found at most video stores. If you have trouble finding the videos released by CHV or Mongrel, you can reach these companies at 416-633-9079 (CHV) and 416-516-9775 (Mongrel).

The year 2000 promises to be an active one for "Jewish" videos, with such titles as Man is a Woman, Liberty Heights, Sunshine, Jakδb The Liar, among many others scheduled for release.

Superficial documentary

Unfolding against the backdrop of harrowing footage of religious wars past and present, Sleeping with the Enemy makes the case that organized religion is a divisive force, and that political leaders down through the ages have used religion to promote intolerance and prejudice.

These are plausible arguments, but at the end of the day this documentary is superficial. An important subject like interfaith relationships deserves substantive treatment.

Synagogue in Cochin, India dates back to 1568

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

COCHIN, India — In the tropical state of Kerala on India's romantic Malabar Coast, the city of Cochin boasts the subcontinent's oldest Jewish settlement.

It's always warm in Kerala, and the morning of our visit to the synagogue in Mattancherry dawns pleasantly clear.

Strolling through the shaded laneways of this fabled neighbourhood, we pass the premises of spice wholesalers. Mounds of cardamon and pepper – the "black gold" of Malabar – are set next to fresh ginger, drying in the morning sun.

The spice trade once fed whole empires. Now tourism brings the world to Kerala.

The shops along this popular tourist route advertise curios and "antiks."

Ironically, the Jewish community, once populous and prosperous, has itself become a "curio," a rarity, in this neighbourhood, which is unselfconsciously known as Jewtown. Estimates are that between 17 and 25 Jews still live in Cochin – about five families.

The greatest antique in the area may well be the synagogue, which dates from 1568.

Yet the ties between Jews and this narrow strip of land running down India's western coast far predate the 16th century.

Two years after the destruction of the second Temple, Jews landed in Kerala, where they were welcomed by the Hindu Rajah. They made their home in the port known to the Greeks as Muzhiris, to the Jews as Shingly (its Indian name is Crangamor), where a Jewish kingdom flourished from the fifth to the 15th century.

Several accounts by medieval travellers attest to the existence of a Jewish kingdom in India. Among the proud possessions of the community in Cochin are copper plates dating from 379 (CE), granting special privileges to Jewish leader Joseph Rabban, the Prince of Anjuvannam, and to all his descendants, "so long as the world and moon exist."

These include exemption from dues, and privileges like the firing of salutes to celebrate daybreak and marriage feasts – such privileges were otherwise exclusively the rights of Cochin kings.

But Crangamor was destroyed by the Moors in 1524. Fleeing the destruction, so the legend goes, Joseph Azar swam with his wife on his shoulders to the port of Cochin. Here Jews were again granted the protection of the Hindu Maharajah.

Jewish soldiers fought for Cochin royalty against the Portuguese, who had invaded in 1500.

Built in 1568, the Cochin Synagogue shares a wall with the Maharajah's own palace and temple – a wall that today could use some shoring up.

As we approach the old building, it presents an unprepossessing whitewashed exterior. Tropical shutters on the windows keep out the sun. Under the shaded front entrance, a young man sits at a table with a few items for sale: replicas of the famous copper plates, a short history of the Kerala Jews, some postcards.

Inside the Cochin Synagogue.

Nothing here prepares us for the riches of the interior. Most striking are the handpainted Chinese floor tiles, 1,100 willow-patterned tiles, no two exactly alike. A gift in 1762 from the merchant prince, Ezekial Rahabi, the tiles mark a flourishing period in the community's history. The Portuguese were gone, and the tolerant Dutch had taken their place as imperial rulers.

More than 20 crystal chandeliers hang from the ceiling.

Peaceful and quiet, the interior glows with the burnished warmth of the old tiles, brass pillars, and the light and airy chandeliers, some clear, some vividly coloured. The cooing of pigeons outside the walls can be heard. There is no other sound.

It is early, and only my husband and I, our guide and three Indian nuns are here. The nuns are Syrian Christians, followers of the "doubting" St. Thomas, and claim a long history in Kerala, where a quarter of the population is Christian.

After India achieved independence, the last ruler of Cochin visited the synagogue in 1949, in order to formally thank his Jewish neighbours for their centuries-long friendship and unflinching loyalty to the King and country that adopted and sheltered them.

When a group of American tourists arrives, my reverie ends. One man makes some announcements.

"Don't take my photograph," is the first. "I don't talk to journalists," is the second. Subdued giggling greets these pronouncements as the man soberly waits for silence. He then opens the doors to reveal the Torahs – after explaining what they are and what they contain.

The scrolls are between 100 and 200 years old and very beautiful, glowing brass against a red background.

Moving out of camera range, the man declares: "Now you may take photographs." And we do, noting the gold crown given for the Torah in 1805 by the Maharajah of Travancore.

Why, we wonder, has the Jewish community in Kerala shrunk so drastically?

After independence, the Jews of Kerala missed the special privileges granted them "so long as the world and moon exist." Jewish holidays were no longer recognized as exemptions from work or school examinations. In ancient days, whole battles would be rescheduled so that Jewish soldiers wouldn't have to fight on the Sabbath.

As India became an increasingly secular state, the majority of Cochin Jews opted for life in Israel, citing religion, not prejudice, as their reason for leaving. So their reputation as "honoured guests" from the day they arrived, in the words of the last king of Cochin, remains intact.

Leaving the synagogue, we pass a stream of Syrian Christian schoolgirls clad in blue uniforms, with bright pink bows in their hair. Smiling nuns shepherd them toward the synagogue.

As one of the oldest and most revered buildings in Cochin, the synagogue is a favourite destination with both locals and tourists.

Smiling back at the girls, I recall what an Indian psychiatrist told me about Indian attitudes to groups who had fled to found new communities here: "We respect the Jews and the Parsees [the followers of Zoroaster]," she said. "They never tried to convert us."

KIRSHENBLATT PAINTINGS HANG AT QUEEN'S PARK

Toronto octogenarian Meyer Kirshenblatt grew up in the Polish town of Opatow (also known as Apt) and immigrated with his family to Toronto in 1934. A retired paint and wallpaper merchant, he turned to painting more than a decade ago as a means of visually telling some of the stories he remembers from his childhood village.

The focus of a triumphant showing some years ago at the Koffler Gallery in North York, Kirshenblatt presently has an exhibition of 40 paintings at the Aird Gallery, in Queen's Park, until Jan. 8.

The exhibition originated two months ago, after the curator of the Koffler show, Joan Tooke, an administrator at the Art Gallery of Ontario, approached the 83-year-old artist to see if he would assemble another show in the provincial government's art space.

Kirshenblatt quickly agreed and enlisted his daughter, the internationally renowned folklorist Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, to help mount the show.

The 40 pieces are a fine sampling of the artist's style. His canvases are strongly narrative, each telling a story from the shtetl; each is accompanied by a card explaining the scene it depicts.

Despite the rough, primitive and often unpolished quality of the compositions, they are powerful and magical in their ability to open a window onto the vivid and rich life in Apt that Kirshenblatt remembers in such fine detail.

There are scenes of the kitchen, the cheder, the town square, the cemetery, the synagogue and other beguiling views. There are also four paintings related to the Holocaust, showing the Germans evacuating the Jews from the town, and Kirshenblatt's depiction of how the Nazis murdered his own family in a field, tying his grandmother to a tree so she could witness the slaughter of the others before being killed herself. These pieces are raw and powerful.

Kirshenblatt says he was always reluctant to treat the Holocaust era in his work because he had not been an eyewitness to the atrocities. The Holocaust paintings are a recent addition to his oeuvre.

"The reason I never tried to paint these scenes of destruction is because I wasn't there," he says. "I knew the stories, but I never bothered painting them. Then I visited the Prado Museum in Madrid and I saw Goya's The Slaughter of the Innocents. That's what gave me the idea."

At the opening of the show earlier this month, Kirshenblatt-Gimblett gave this reviewer a brief guided tour of the paintings, pointing out exemplary features such as her father's extraordinary use of colour and his treatment of windows and other compositional elements.

An author and professor of performance studies and Jewish folklore at New York University, Kirshenblatt-Gimblett is an astute critic and curator. She purposely hung an earlier work of her father's to begin the show, to give visitors a sense of his progress.

Father and daughter are also putting the finishing touches on a coffee-table book of his art, which they expect will be published within the coming year.

Aird Gallery, 900 Bay St. at Wellesley, in the McDonald Block. Free admission.

Waxman to direct Diary of Anne Frank

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Two plays of Jewish interest are part of the Stratford Festival's 2000 lineup.

Al Waxman will direct The Diary of Anne Frank by Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett and newly adapted by Wendy Kesselman.

Waxman made his Stratford debut two years ago when he starred as Willy Loman in Death of a Salesman. He joked at a press conference recently that his acting didn't make much of an impression since this time they asked him to direct not act.

The role of Anne Frank will be played by Maggie Blake, 17.

The Diary of Anne Frank runs May 4 to Nov. 5 at the Avon Theatre.

The musical Fiddler On The Roof runs at the Festival Theatre between May 6 and Nov. 4.

Based on the book by Joseph Stein, with songs by Jerry Bock and Sheldon Harwick, this production is directed by Susan Schulman and stars Brent Carver as Tevye and Theresa Tova as Yente.

Other plays next year include Shakespeare's Hamlet, As You Like It, Titus Andronicus, Timothy Findley's Elizabeth Rex, The Three Musketeers by Peter Raby, Moliere's Tartuffe, Oscar Wilde's The Importance of Being Earnest, Patience by Gilbert and Sullivan, Euripides' Medea and Collected Stories by Donald Margulies.

Group launched to raise funds for diabetes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Barb Pasternak is not one to sit back and let someone else do it.

When first her younger son, Bobby, and later her older son Jesse, were diagnosed with Type 1 diabetes, she decided that she had to do more than help her children adjust to the serious demands of a potentially life-threatening disease.

She created Flame of Hope, an organization that raises funds for research, for Camp Huronda (for diabetic children), and for special awards. The main methods of fundraising are an annual golf tournament and gala dinner, and a raffle.

In diabetes, part of the complicated process of converting food into energy, breaks down.

Insulin, the chemical produced in the pancreas, must be present in the bloodstream in order for the cells of the body to absorb glucose, the pure form of sugar created by the digestive system to act as fuel for the body.

There are two types of diabetes: Type I, also called juvenile or insulin-dependent diabetes; or Type II, sometimes called maturity-onset or non-insulin dependent.

Type I, which frequently starts in childhood, occurs when the body can produce little or no insulin of its own.

Type II occurs when the body either does not produce enough insulin or cannot adequately utilize what it does produce. Symptoms and complications tend to be less severe than in Type I.

Pasternak noted that recent studies have shown a marked rise in Type II diabetes in children, especially aboriginal children. It is not known why, although a sedentary lifestyle and poor diet have been suggested.

Symptoms can include increased and often severe thirst, greatly increased urination, weight loss, itching of the skin, fatigue, changes in vision, and slow healing of cuts and bruises.

Diabetes can be controlled by careful diet, exercise, frequent blood glucose monitoring, and carefully controlled medication.

And controlled it must be. Complications may include blindness, heart disease, nerve damage (especially in the legs and feet), stroke, amputations and kidney failure.

Pasternak admits that she knew very little about diabetes until her 10-year-old son, Bobby, a competitive hockey player, complained of being tired, loosing weight, and constant urination.

"Four days before we were scheduled to leave on a business trip, I took Bobby to the pediatrician. We were immediately sent to the Hospital for Sick Children. His blood glucose level was 40 (normal is from four to six).

"Our life changed. Our world changed."

The family, especially Bobby, had to get used to weighing food, poking fingers to check blood glucose, and having needle injections of insulin.

She noted that the development of the pen injector has made the process much easier and more comfortable.

About two years ago, her son Jesse, then 14, wasn't feeling well. Just for fun, he tested himself with his brother's blood glucose monitor. His glucose level was very high, and later tests confirmed that he too has Type I diabetes.

"We were devastated," Pasternak told The CJN. "It felt like we were being crucified."

Pasternak has nothing but praise for the diabetic program at Hospital for Sick Children, which provides regular check-ups, monitoring and an education program for both the patient and the parents.

The problem is that, like many HSC programs, youngsters are only serviced until they are 18. After that, they must switch to an adult care facility.

The change from the warm and supportive atmosphere of HSC to the more formal and distant adult care hospitals can be very difficult.

In fact, Pasternak said, at this time, 30 percent don't go for regular visits or take proper care of themselves, and they wind up in hospital.

"We want to motivate kids to get into better practices before they go to university, so we established a scholarship fund" to give them encouragement and boost their self esteem.

Applicants submit a blind application (one where no name or other identifying mark is on the form). Part of the information they must include is a statement of how they are dealing with their diabetes. Winners are chosen by a committee.

The first year, three youngsters won $1,500 and a plaque. The next year, six winners won $2,500 each.

Flame of Hope has also helped build a new infirmary at Camp Huronda, called the Insul Inn.

Two months ago, Pasternak established the Flame of Hope Foundation to put her activities on a more formal basis. She hopes to create a Web site shortly.

For more information, call Pasternak at 905-670-0955, or e-mail barb@fluidhose.com.

Weizmann scientists explore how the human brain works

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The potential to change and sculpt the brain is vast, according to a biologist at the Weizmann Institute of Science.

"We have endless potential to change the way the nervous system operates," said Prof. Henry Markram of Weizmann's department of neurobiology. "The brain is always rapidly changing."

Markram, whose area of research centres on mapping the brain and determining how it functions, was the keynote speaker at the recent annual meeting of the Canadian Society of the Weizmann Institute of Science.

The scientist has to find rules to predict how to redirect the brain, Markram said.

"The research is directed at finding the control button...We're trying to find the secrets to redirect the way the brain is developing."

Markram said basic research is the foundation of applied research, noting that at Weizmann "the merit of pure science is appreciated and independent research is encouraged."

According to Markram the principles and knowledge understood through brain research can lead to the development of exercises rather than pharmaceutical solutions for memory loss, and to treatment to improve the processing of information for people with learning difficulties.

Comparing the brain to a computer chip, Markram explained that the brain is made up of neurons that are connected to each other through a network of some 100 billion synapses.

The power of the brain comes from this network, which is why it is important to understand the architecture and structure of the network, he said.

"Each neuron broadcasts an extremely complicated message and the synapses have to extract information from the neurons."

Memory is based on the alignment of the synapses, he said. "Computer projection can predict memory lapses. New treatments can be designed to target alignment of the synapses. But there is no current treatment for memory loss based on this," Markram said.

A lot of learning problems can be attributed to problems of synapse alignment and timing in the firing on the synapse, he said. "We can train the brain to fix timing mistakes. The visual and auditory synapses can be out of alignment. We can improve the way information is processed."

Parts of the brain can be targeted by specific test to pinpoint learning deficits, and a computer program now in use treats people with dyselexia through a reprogramming of the brain, he said.

Through brain research we can tell how much the brain can change and when it can change, he said.

And environment has a profound impact on the brain, he added.

Referring to the use of video games by young children for example, Markram said video games may offer a way "to develop reflexes. However the images associated with the games may be devastating. We don't know the impact."

Will undergo chemotherapy and then a bone marrow transplant

Community responds to Roger Neilson illness

TORONTO — As the news of Roger Neilson's battle with bone marrow cancer was announced to a surprised Canadian public, Canadian Jewry responded with concern.

One of the most innovative and respected coaches in the hockey world, Roger Neilson is a popular figure in the Jewish community.

Since 1997, the legendary coach has donated his time and expertise to help run a two week hockey camp (Roger Neilson's Hockey Camp in Israel) for Israeli and Canadian teens in Israel.

The camp takes place at the Canada Centre in Metulla located on the northern tip of Israel.

He has also sponsored the attendance of Israeli teens at his hockey camp in Lindsay, Ontario.

Jeff Budd, one of the organizers of the camp, reported that "Roger's Israeli campers found out about his illness almost immediately, via ESPN. They have been calling Canada ever since, anxiously inquiring about Roger's status."

Neilson helping a youngster perfect his skating skills at the Canada Centre in Metulla.

After the recent Philadelphia Flyers and Toronto Maple Leafs match up (where the coach received a standing ovation from the generally partisan Toronto crowd), Jeff Budd relayed the Israeli youths' concerns to Roger Neilson.

Neilson replied. "Don't worry we'll be ready to go by this summer," (referring to next year's hockey camp in Israel).

Neilson, who is optimistic he will overcome the disease, will undergo chemotherapy and then a bone marrow transplant.

Allan Cracower, chair of Friends of Canada Centre, said that: "Roger Neilson's compassion, kindness, generosity, love of children and admiration of Israel have had an impact on all who have come into contact with him.

"Through his speeches and interviews, Roger served as Israel's unofficial ambassador to sports-minded people in North America, always speaking laudably about Israel and its remarkable young people."

At the UIA Federations Canada winter board meeting in Ottawa, Dr. Gerald Halbert, a past president of UIA Federations Canada and president of Friends of Canada Centre, stated that "Roger has been a great friend of Israel over the years."

"We all wish him a speedy recovery," he noted on behalf of the board.

The Inside Back

A Jewish guide to shovelling snow

By JORDAN MAX

Last year, we had a lot of snow. I spent many hours shovelling snow. Shovelling snow is boring work, and after a while, a mind tends to wander. So I resolved that this year I would be prepared with lots to think about.

Last Laugh

I did some research and sent letters to key Jewish figures, polling them for their keen insight on shovelling snow. Their responses:

Ariel Sharon – "The important thing is to shovel the entire width and breadth of the driveway, regardless of what anyone else thinks."

Ehud Barak – "You must shovel most of the driveway, but the exact dimensions of shovelling will be determined in discussions with our peace partners. No wait, you can shovel only in places where snow had previously fallen, but you cannot shovel in places where no snow had fallen. Wait, don't do any shovelling until you hear from me."

Yossi Sarid – "You should not shovel any part of the driveway, since you really do not have any valid historical or legal claim to the driveway, and it will soon be given back to its rightful owners."

Artscroll Hilchos Sheleg (Ashkenaz version, chapter 5) – "First approach the snow with the proper kavanah, meditating on the concept of snow removal. Recite the al ligraf sheleg brachah; then take three steps back and bend the knees slightly with feet together; then look at the snow, lift shovel and dig, turning right and then left. Bend knees fully, take three steps forward and deposit snow deliberately. Repeat until done, then recite the Shehecheyanu prayer, go indoors and have a hot drink, remembering to say the Shehakol brachah (see Artscroll Hilchos on Drinking Hot Liquids)."

Tikkun magazine – "What right do we have to violently take snow from its rightful resting place? Snow has rights. Each snowflake is a unique individual and we have absolutely no right to do anything with it. Let the snow decide for itself what it wishes to do, and then if it wishes to be shovelled, do it humanely."

Rashi – "Snow, this is a form of solid precipitation that clings to your beard if you remain outside too long in the winter season. Shovelling is a mitzvah d'rabbanan, based on the verse in Yeshayahu (1:18) – If your sins be like scarlet, they will be as white as snow."

Birthright Israel – "It does not matter how the shovelling is done, but the very act of Jewish teenagers shovelling snow for 10 consecutive days under proper supervision, will have a lifelong impact on Jewish identity."

Meir Ben-Meir (Israeli water commissioner) – "Just shovel the snow as fast as you can and ship it here. We are running out of water fast! Is anyone listening to me?"

Rabbi David Hartman – "Snow is a potent force in the world which unites all Jews. It falls on us all, regardless of religious denomination and belief, and is therefore instrumental in our understanding of Jewish unity and diversity. In fact, just this week, I was explaining the significance of snow to Prime Minister Ehud Barak, President Ezer Weizmann, President Bill Clinton, and His Holiness the Pope, who had asked my opinion."

The late Lubavitcher Rebbe (from a letter to a disciple) – "Shovelling snow is a distraction from our efforts to bring Mashiach, may He come soon, when in any case, there will be no snow to shovel. So leave it and let it melt. If Mashiach does not come by Shavuot, the snow will have miraculously disappeared anyway."

Now, if I could just find my boots!

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

It is so confusing to be a guy! Most of the time a guy is expected to ask a girl out, or to flirt a lot with the girl he likes.

However, I am getting mixed messages from girls, and especially from one girl, Anna, who I know because we go to the same camp, but she lives in the United States.

I sort of liked her at camp, but she had a serious boyfriend back home, so I didn't really show her I was interested. We exchanged e-mail addresses, and we write to each other every day.

I look forward to reading her e-mails and check them as soon as I get home from school. Lately, our e-mails have been really personal. She has written to me saying how important I am to her.

The confusing part is that she still has a boyfriend and I think I may like her. I think about her all the time, and I wait for her e-mails. Should I tell her that I have feelings for her or should I just stop writing and get over her?

E-mail my broken heart

Dear E.M.B.H.,

We know it's confusing to be a guy and it's hard to work out the mixed signals that girls often give.

It seems that you are important to each other, but you have to remember a few things about your relationship.

First, Anna lives far away, and you would only be able to communicate via telephone or e-mail for most of the year.

Also, your relationship has developed by e-mail, and sometimes people are less timid when there is no face-to-face pressure.

Furthermore, words can mean different things to different people, and what Anna means to say in her e-mails may be understood by you differently.

Finally, Anna has a serious boyfriend, and whether or not she still has feelings for him, he is her boyfriend now. All of these factors combined, create a very tricky situation.

It seems that you and Anna can be open and honest with each other. You should not be afraid to tell her how much you enjoy her e-mails, and how much your friendship means to you. If she responds positively, you may want to ask her how she feels about you, and tell her how you feel about her.

It is important to be honest, but your friendship is also important, and you would not want to jeopardize it because you are unsure of the meaning of her e-mails. Good luck and remember to be honest!

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto.
